Wine Glass Fast Replacing Famous Stein in Germany

By the souvenir he brings back shall ye know him. Through this medium the customs officials daily greeting American tourists on their return from Germany judge with unfailing accuracy the quality of each and every tourist. When an inspector finds, a stein in a trunk—and he finds many-be knows that the traveler is a pleasure seeker of the conventional type. For the stein these days is in the same category as the mustache cup. Its days of practical usefulness have passed, and it is fast becoming a

In Berlin to-day the German indulges in his traditional beer. Even the most hesitant suggestion that beer may be losing its favor there will awaken the most pacific German to a state of wrath. He takes as much beer as he ever did-perhaps more; but he drinks now from a sturdy little mug and not from the highly decorated stein. The university students of Berlin, Kiel and other cities have forsaken the distinguishing mark of Germany. When they engage in their bar-room festivities they retain, with the one exception, all the trappings of old. The jaunty caps, the little mats that go under each container and serve as an adding machine in determining the price of the evening's enjoyment are all in their appointed places, but the stein is gone. Whatever beer the students imbibe is taken from plain mugs. centres and the provinces one finds the stein supreme in every beer garden. There, where the old customs prevail, the fight to keep the stein in use rather than on the shelf is being vigorously waged-but lest Commercialism sweeps all before it. The manufacturers of Germany no longer make a feature of the stein. In its place they offer a round, plain mug. The broken stein is hard to replace. The factory manager knows that the stein is fast becoming passe, he will make only a few, enough to supply the wants of the tourist, for his leading product is and will continue to be the mug.

The stein has retired from active service. It has been relegated to the sidelines, where it accumulates dust and honor. One of its most formidable enemies has been the wine glass a startling foe, one that was hardly expected by a German product, yet its entry came naturally enough. Not long after the financial crisis struck Germany the worker, the clerk, the manager and the salaried man demanded his pay at the end of each day. Defiation was so rapid that what was a thousand marks one day was five hundred, sometimes less, on the subsequent day.

Even when wages were paid daily the Germans saw that they had to be spent immediately if full value was to be realized. Investments, even now few and seldom safe, were unknown soon after the signing of the armistice. In spite of the chaos, many retained their senses and the rent was paid and necessities purchased. Often a tidy sum remained. It had to be spent; tomorrow it was worthless. So the German bought wine. It cost much more than beer and the German

Then a wave of reaction struck Berlin, the ripples of which extended far out into the countryside. Wine was the national drink of France. Discussion was carried on for months and then it was remembered that the early production of wine had not been limited to any one country-in fact, that Germany had always been facture—so the tongue and taste were found mightier than patriotism, and by degrees wine drinking became the accepted indulgence.
