

THE SOUTH SEA COAST PROTECTIVE BILL has been passed by the British Parliament, regulating the introduction of native laborers to the colonial plantations. It is framed so as to prevent the atrocious traffic that disgraced the late Bishop Pattison. As our readers will remember, the natives of the South Sea Islands were kidnapped by unprincipled captives, who sold them to labor on the Queensland plantations. They prostituted the British flag, and even personated the missionary bishop for this piratical purpose. The horrors of this transportation were little better than those of the "middle passage." The present act is intended to prevent anything like these slave-trade abominations. It allows only voluntary service. It requires fair and full contracts. It stipulates for public supervision and protection. It remains, however, to be seen whether an act of the kind can be so framed as not to be evaded; whether such a traffic can be regulated; and whether confidence, which is a plant of slow growth, will be again restored by these measures among the unspiculated South Sea Islanders.
