CHAPTER XVI.

The Tumuit in Human Hearts.

Of the many frightful nights in Richmond during the seige, that night was one of the worst.

The comparative calmone of the worst.

Dess of the earlier hours or repose of the world April evening gave way to pandemonium. The works at Petersburg, desperately held by the Confederates, were perately held by the Confederates, were miles away from the city to the southward, but such was the tremendous nature of the cannonading that the shocking sound seemed to be close at hand. Children cowered, women shuddered, and old men prayed as they thought of the furlous onslaughts in the battle raging.

risked everything, was ready to pay everything, would, indeed, be forced to do so in the end, and yet he had not done that which he had intended. Had he been false to his duty and to his country when he refused to send that telegram, being given the opportunity! He could not tell. The, ethics of the question were beyond his present; solution. The opportunity had come to him through a piece of sublime self-sacrifice on the part of the woman, who, knowing him thoroughly and understanding his plan and purpose, had yet perjured herself to save his life.

That life was hers, was it not? He had become her prisoner as much as if she had placed him under lock and key, and held him without the possibility of communication with anyone. Her honor was involved. No, under the circumstances, he could not send the dispatch. The Confederates would certainly kill him if they caught him, and if they did not, and by any providential chance he escaped, his honor would compel him to report the circumstances, the cause of his failure, to his own superiors. Would they court-martial him for not sending the dispatch? Would they understand? Would the woman and her actions be considered by them as determining factors? Would his course be looked upon as justifiable? He could not flatter himself that any one of these things would be so considered by any military court. There would be only two things which would influence his superiors in their judgment of him. Did he get a chance, and having it, did he use it?

The popular idea of a Secret Service agent, a spy, was that he would stick at nothing. As such men were outside the pale of military brotherhood, so were they supposed to have a code of their own. Well, his code did not permit him to send the dispatch when his power to send it had been procured in such a way. It was not so much love for the woman as it was honor—her honor, suddenly put into his keeping—that turned him from the key. When both honor and love were thrown into the scale, there was no possibility of any other action. He

He could not see any call of duty paramount to them.

He stood looking at Foray for a while, and then, without a further command to that intensely surprised young man, or even a word of explanation, he seized his hat and coat and left the room. Foray was a keen-witted officer; he reviewed the situation briefly, and presently a great light dawned upon him. A certain admiration for Thorne developed in his breast, and as Allison opportunely came back at this juncture, he turned the telegraph office over to his subordinate, and in his turn went out on what he believed to be an exceedingly important errand.

St. Catharines, July 11. - While playing with a loaded gun yesterday, Russel Brady, the 13-year-old son of George Brady, Wellandport, shot his little brother George, six years old, killing him. Both the boys had firearms and had been amusing them-selves with the deadly weapons. It is not known just how the fatality happened, but the bullet entered the head of the younger brother and death resulted almost instantly.

Coroner Dr. Jamieson, of Wellandport, was notified, and opened an inquest in that place this afternoon. After hearing some evidence the inquiry was adjourned until next Monday, when the matter will be more
