not planned by anyone. The original idea was to send delegates to the conventions of both parties, but that was found to be only a beaut ful theory. The Manitoulin by-election and the North Ontarlo by-election pointed the way to the test of the movement in the general election. Up to that time they had not a platform, and when they made a political platform in a hurry it proved to be a narrow one. Its central plank was economy. The reason for economy was evident.

narrow one. Its central plank was economy. The reason for economy was evident.

The reason for economy was evident.

"There is no other credit in the country today that has not been encroached upon except the credit of the townships." The debt of the cities amounts to over one-quarter of the assessed value. When you add to that the amount of private mortgages it suggests caution to anyone wishing to lend more money."

Other planks in the platform of the farmers was educational facilities for the 90 per cent, who never went beyond the common schools, and a constructive forestry policy, a policy having in view not only the protection of the forests of Ontario from fire, but their perpetuation and the reforestation of the desert places of old Ontario. (Loud applause.) Lands and forests were now separated from the mines. (Applause.) Some criticism had met them on the matter of good roads. The farmers want good roads—good roads they can use—(laughter)—not necessarily from Toronto to Hamilton, but on the five miles from the farmers' house to the nearest market, that must be negotiated by the farmers' "tin Lizzie" in all weathers—(laughter)—five miles of ruts. The farmer is not against the highway from Winasor to Ottawa, if there is money for it, but he wants repairs of the county roads, that have in most cases foundation of excellent metal. The farmer wants a fair distribution of the money derived from automobile licenses. (Applause.) Cement roads are all right if the province can afford them; the roads leading past our doors thruout the country call for repairs first.

Strong for Projetition.

Turning to the old-parties, Premier Drury said the politicians had not guaged rural opinion. The last of the narrow farmers' planks is prohibition, and it is going to be sympathetically and effectively enforced. (Applause.) Upon this narrow platform the U.F.O. had surprised itself almost as much as it surprised everybody else, But when the responsibility of government faced them they
