It was suggested to him that the Junction ratepayers might be tempted by the prospect of $20,000 odd.

"I don't believe they would. In the first place, we asked the company to run the cars. They ran them as a favor to oblige us. Would it be fair for us now to fight them in this mattar? I don't want the railway company to think for one moment that we want to fight them. The town has taken no action at all in the matter, but we will have a council meeting on Wednesday evening to consider it."

Mayor Smith was not apparently inpressed witt the argument that if the fown sided with the railway company the fines would all go to the plaintiff, and seemed to think there would be more than a suspicion of tainted money about the transaction.
