TOO TRUE.
"No one understands me!" he groaned; "no one on earth." It is the old story of a young man, a tortured, youthful heart. The sufferer is generally mistaken, but the pain is no less poignant. Yet in this instance the man's complaint was true. Nobody on earth could understand him. For he was an announcer of trains at the Union depot.

"Does the razor hurt, sir?" inquired the barber anxiously. "Can't say," replied the victim, testily, "but my face does."

The Dream

The Story of A Woman's Happiness — By — Mabel N. Thurston

IV.
It was Allison Deering who thought of it. She had been married only three months, and it was so radiantly happy that her joy brimmed over upon every one about her; and one day she had her inspiration. For a moment she stood fairly dazed at the brilliancy of it, then she watched up the first thing handy—it happened to be one of her kitchen aprons—threw it over her head, and ran across the street to Miss McGivern's.

"I've the loveliest idea," she exclaimed, her cheeks pink with excitement under the apron. "I couldn't wait a minute to tell you. I—there, I've got the button caught in my hair! Will you help me, please? No, never mind if it comes down! It's about Miss Mattie Lovell. Why couldn't we send her to Washington—all of us—everybody who loves her? If she had ever married, we'd have given her wedding presents, wouldn't we? I never did think it fair that people who miss—the real thing—should miss all the fun of getting married. Look at the presents and the new house and everything. We can tell Miss Mattie it's her uncle present, and our jubilee because we've had her for fifty years. Oh, don't you think we can manage it?"

"I think," Mrs. McGivern answered warmly, "that that's the spirit! I thought we'd had in Canterbury in twenty-five years, and the doctor and I will want to be the first subscribers. You may put us down for five dollars apiece."

"Five dollars apiece?" Allison cried. "I thought a dollar would be the most."

"I will want clothes," Mrs. McGivern reminded her, "and many little extras, and spending money."

"I believe I wasn't a bit more excited over my own wedding!" she cried. "I took up subscriptions for everybody who wanted to go somewhere," she said, "we should soon be bankrupt. No doubt Miss Mattie is a very worthy person, and personally we should be pleased if we could help, but it is a matter of principle. Don't you think this was all very sound, but, after all, a world given entirely upon the understanding principle, and the thing of charm. And nearly everybody was not only willing but eager to have a party. And nearly everybody was not only willing but eager to have a party. No doubt Miss Mattie is a very worthy person, and personally we should be pleased if we could help, but it is a matter of principle. Don't you think this was all very sound, but, after all, a world given entirely upon the understanding principle, and the thing of charm. And nearly everybody was not only willing but eager to have a party.
