A BRAVE SPIRIT.—Young man, be brave! Many people imagine that courage is confined to the field of battle. There could be no greater mistake. Even contention with men, unavoidable contentions, are not by any means limited to public battle-fields. And there are other struggles in private life—struggles with adverse circumstances—struggles, it may be, with habits or appetites or passions—all of which requires as much of courage, and more of perseverance, than the brief, exciting encounter of battle. Enough to struggle against, enough to contend with, enough to overcome, lies in the way of a young man. It may be one kind of difficulty, or it may be another, but plenty of difficulty of some kind every young man just starting in life may be sure that he will find. And the essential thing about it to him is, whether he will be a coward, and succumb, or what the Indians so significantly term, "a brave." He who never falters, no matter how adverse the circumstance, always enjoys within himself the consciousness of a perpetual spiritual triumph of which nothing can deprive him.

BOILING THE MATE.—"Are you the mate?" said a man to the Irish cook of a vessel lying in port. "No," said he, "but I'm the man that boils the mate (meat)."
