crossings between England and the United States his fellow passengers have struggled hard to induce him to "take a hand," but invariably without success. It was at a dinner party recently at Mrs. Potter Palmer's that the financier was irresistibly attracted to the game. He was watching M. Pokiewski's play and the Pole's amazing achievements arrested the attention of the millionaire. For two hours Pierpont Morgan sat, fascinated by the audacious declarations of the skillful player. "By Jove," said finally, "I am going to learn bridge and you, M. Pokiewski, are to be my teacher." It is purely a matter of business between the American and the Pole, and the story goes that Pokiewski is making a handsome thing out of the transaction.
