There was no alternative but to obey.

"Rena!"

Was it a dream, or did she really behold her lover beside her? Recollecting her position, she drew herself up proudity.

"Sir," she said, "if you have any principle at all, after what has passed between us, you will leave me."

"Miss Leslis," he said, with a sorrowful look in his eyes, "it is because I have principle that I come to explain. I saw you at the door last night, and, thinking you were coming in, did not change my position. I have always been taught never to be ashamed of love, and had you entered the room, as I expected, I should have fotroduced you to my dear mother."

"C audef" exclaimed Rena, and burst into tears.

The maiden was slight and fair, her light hair rippling in the cool evening breeze, and her trusting blue eyes turned lovingly to his—he, tall and dark, with brown eyes, that had honesty stamped in every giance, his arm caressingly thrown around her waist; they made a striking picture. As she turned to enter the hotel, he kissed her softly and said:

"Rena, my mother will be here soon, and I know that you will be pleased with her."

Claude Howard was young, rich and handsome, therefore considered a great catch. Rena knew very little about his relations. She had been introduced to him at a ball in New York one evening, and the next day she left town to spend the summer at Saratoga. Then, lightly putting her hand on his shoulder, she went on, gayly, looking him straight in the face: "You must not love me any more, now you are going to be married."

Could Rena believe her eyes? Claude drew the tiny form c'oser to him and kissed her as he had kissed Rena, murming:

"Valerie, whatever happens, whatever I do, I love you so that nothing can ever change my affection for you, my darling."

Rena turned away and hurried to her room, her heart throbbing with emotion, jealous that he whom she loved so much should prize another more than her.

"Why does he not marry her, then?" she asked herself over and over again. "Perhaps she is peor, and he is an adventurer and wants my fortune. Oh, how can I give him up?"

Then she told him about her discovering Claude kissing a young lady.

"I cannot call her a girl, although she was young looking, and beautiful, with dark hair and eyes. She looked only two or three years younger than he, who is twenty-eight. She looked him straight in the face as if she loved him very much; and oh, papa! I saw them, and he was mine!"
