Augustine attracted by the Neoplatonic idea of God as spirit, by its doctrine of the Logos, by its high conception of the soul, and by its apparent reconciliation of evil with the perfection of God,	323
Learning from experience that Neoplatonism did not destroy the power of the passions, Augustine turned to Scripture, and found in the doctrine of the Incarnation the revelation of the inner nature of God and the desiderated means of transforming the whole nature,	326

LECTURE THIRTEENTH AUGUSTINE'S THEOLOGY

Augustine gave Christian Theology a Neoplatonic colouring. His two main ideas are God and sin	330
God essentially self-manifesting. Defence of the Trinity: each "person" expresses a special "function," just as the mind of man is one and yet has the three "functions" of memory, intelligence and will. God rather apprehended by intuition, than comprehended by thought. Augustine insists upon the unity of God, as an answer to Manichaeism, almost at the expense of the distinction of the three "persons,"	332
Creation according to a divine plan. Difficulty of Augustine's view. His defence of the idea of "creation out of nothing." No succession in the divine will, for God is unchangeable, and only the changeable is subject to time. Nor is God extended, for space is relative to body,	336
The creation and preservation of the world identical in essence. Two different views of providence in Augustine,	340
Relation of man to God: Adam originally good, but capable of sin, since he had the power to refuse the aid of God. Self-assertion connected with the
