

TOLD ON CHRISTMAS EVE.

"Doubly, my daughter!" he said, taking Violet into his arms, and kissing her pure, young brow, "the good angels of this Christmas Eve. You shall finish your Christmas tale as you will."

"Hush, hush!" cried Violet, the tears dropping, "tell me that you don't hate me for my doubtful death. I could not help it; indeed I could not."

"I shall get over it in time, I dare say," Perry, replied, his eyes twinkling. "Did you know of this, Charles?"

"Daddy," replied Charles, "I did not know until now that I was my brother. To say the truth, I thought the affair was over and done with. I will go and find him."

"They came back arm in arm. A man with dark, lustrous eyes and the kindly port of the Sisters, but with a face all his own and his dead mother's. Such was Archibald the younger. Violet stood by her father, her eyes glistening. Mr. Silver, showing more emotion than any one could have believed, clasped his neck and outstretched hands."

"Welcome home, my boy," he whispered, still retaining still the hands, he turned to his brother.

"Annie!" he said, "where is your well-coming?"

"Here," replied Annie, taking Violet's hand and placing it in her brother's, "one more expressive than words."
