For God's own evermore. O lovely faith! great gift of heaven! By which we look within You flaming sapphire gates, and see Our kindred saved from sin, With garments pure, and crowns of stare, And reigning kings for aye. Their glories mingle with the light Of heaven's unfeding day.

We see our friend and brother there Beyond the tide of time-Caught from the love that here By love far more sublime; Caught from the vine so wont to cling Unto his manly form. That both might rest themselves on God, And live above the storm.

He sought the blood of Judah's Lamb, He found it ever nigh, Its power did help him well to live. And helped him well to die; He breathed no murmur or regret, So soon to gain his home, And while he hoping, waiting, lay, The chariot had come.

He gently loosed the hand he held-His own dear partner's hand,-For, O, a hand was reached to him Across from Canaan's land; And there were sighs and tears below And hearts were wounded, riven, But there were smiles, and joys, and songs, And a new harp in heaven.

His noble nature now we miss,— We miss our husband, friend, But may not God depute him now, Sustaining grace to lend? A tie that bound us to the earth Is sacred evermore, And fastened to the throne that stands

On vonder song-blest shore. Happy the hosts inside the gates. Who see the glories there! The feeblest glimpses are but ours, For more we could not bear; But yet enough we see and know, To long for spirit light, And wish ourselves among the throng, Who walk with God in white.

The Old Schoolmaster.

As Mr. Everton More, a wealthy merchant, stout, rosy, and portly, and something past fifty, was sitting at home one evening, he was called upon by an aged man, who was accompanied by a little boy of ten. The visitor was tail, erect, dischedience. Think you that such punishments ly justified by our subscribers and the reading pubthin, and pale, dressed in a neat but rusty suit made no impression on my young mind; that lie of black, and apparently not far from seventy they did not sink deep into my memory, never readers is rather increased than diminished by the years of age. His face was refined and not unhandsome, though clouded by a melancholy which gave sign of mental suffering, as plainly as his iron-gray hair of age.

"Your case, I hope," returned the merchant, archly, " was not so bad as that of the old man in the fable, who, in trying to do right and please truly : were I young and strong again, with all all, pleased nobody ?" master-"

" Far from it; very far indeed, Sir," exclaimed the veteran-tutor, with a momentary flush, which betrayed his pride of success in his calling; "I have only cited these trials of a teacher's patience and fidelity, to remind you, in part, those times, when scores of parents did not express swered, in a husky voice, yet firmly : their thanks to me, for my fidelity to their children.
