The Economic View.

The New York Herald will not be sus pected of having any special leanings towards prohibition. This, however, is what it says: From the economic standpoint there is no question that the Prohibitionists have the better of the argument. It is an error to contend that a city or town is affected for the better by the sale of liquor. Nobody who would have the right to claim membership in even the third rank of economists asserts that by any possible means or under any circumstances can the saloon be a source of wealth to the community.
