Garm and Household.

FOR THE FARMER.

In many country houses, just now a large share of the domestic activities may be included in this comprehensive phrase. The busy tasks are all too many for the shortening days. The last preserving and pickling, the fall sewing, the fall cleaning, the care and arrangement of plants for the windows, the getting out and renovating the winter clothing, the storing of the cellar for the cold months to come—all these and many others press upon us in the golden autumn days that pass only too swiftly. The open doors and windows, the fruit and vegetables in the orchard and garden; the milk and butter sweet from the sweet pasture grasses that have sprung up so freely after the long drench rains; the hammock under the maple tree, where the hour of rest is spent in comradeship with bird and bee and butterfly—these must be resigned and comfort found in more artificial conditions.

The northern winter compels foresight. We are told on the authority of Agassiz, whose eager enthusiasm in the study of organic life always included man, that the dwellers on the Amazon said the wonderful prodigality of tropical nature, suffer actual want at times, in the presence of amazingly rich natural resources, because the luxury of freedom of earth's lavish bounty induces them to trust wholly to chance and not at all to their own industry. We know how unfavorable such situations have proved to the best qualities of manhood and womanhood. The life that is so seductively easy and pleasant, without labor, becomes of little value. Moral obligations are forgotten, the higher wants are lost sight of, an indolent, languid life is soon sunk in ignorance and stagnation, and becomes hardly more noble than that of the lower animal creation. These are facts, and it is a fact too, that the Brazilians, living on the borders of a river so vast as to be almost a fresh water ocean, and teeming with delicious fish, but and eat the salt cod secured by the hardship of our stout New England fishermen!

Our winter comfort and home enjoyment depend so absolutely upon foresight that this real foundation of much that is essential to the very idea of the home. The Brazilian Indian lives in a canoe; a palm-thatched hut with bare walls, and pegs upon which to hang the hammocks which he makes from fibre also gathered in the forest; a few primitive implements for cooking, fishing and hunting; a single garment of the rudest native manufacture—these, and the freedom of the woodlands, which are also boat ways, and all the rest he treasures to happy accident. How little of what human life means to us is to be found in such an existence! He seeks to command by his utmost efforts, as many of the good things of daily living as our susceptibilities crave and the extent of our development decides the limits of this craving. We want books, pictures, opportunities of instruction; we must live in the life of thought. In outward arrangements we seem to satisfy our own sense of order, symmetry and beauty. There is something stirring in us by the mere bodily needs of hunger and cold. We earnestly desire to carry ## on the work of human progress, to give our children opportunities beyond our own, to seem 'made the most of themselves'—this is the birthright of civilization.

Our getting ready for winter, then, does not mean providing food and clothing merely, important as these are. The homely, necessary cares for food and fire, the provisions for cheerful days and comfortable nights, however low the mercury may sink, take on a new dignity and value when we consider the physical life in its true relation to that which is intellectual and spiritual. A good home is a seed-bed for all that is best in human life. Could anything be better worth while than making the most of this opportunity? Considerations like these exalt the humblest work, and give new courage and spirit for its faithful and thorough performance.

The complexity of modern life tends to throw responsibility more and more upon the mother and housekeeper. She is bound to have regard to sanitary considerations, in real or fancied security. It is no longer enough to follow neatness blindly, for its own sake, but we must be on our guard against a host of dangerous microbes. Here again life rests lightly upon the dwellers in tropic lands. With scarcely clothing to deserve the name, and an open hammock as the sole sleeping arrangement, with no exclusion of free air, where doors and windows are closed only by mats of palm fibre, there is immunity from many of the dangers against which we must scrupulously defend our households. But how great are the compensations that accompany the more strenuous life! Earnest effort is demanded, but it brings an ample reward. The rich satisfactions of a well ordered and happy home are great enough to repay with interest every outlay of strength and thoughtful care which the rolling seasons, in their continual change require.

Never are the charms of home greater or its privileges more dear than in winter, when the long even- ing and the cheerful hours around the lamp leave an impression never to be effaced. In making ready for winter we are putting into real shape our ideal of that home life which means so much in our highest aspirations.

Far reaching as the earth's remotest reaches, the pulses of the world are beating as ocean foam.

One thought is sacred in the breast of man.

It is the thought of home.

This little world he human fate shall

With destinies above.

For there the home of his immortal mind

Is in God's wider love.

Country Gentleman.

A correspondent of the Buffalo News gives a peculiar remedy for chocking. He says: "I saw my mother relieve a neighbor who was nearly dead by going behind her and simply giving a quick jerk to her ears—taking hold of them by the top—and the piece of meat on the top of her head was chocking her across the room and lodged on the opposite wall. I have tried it dozens of times with my own children."
