HIS LORDSHIP'S ROMANCE

rooms. Love and monage stroumed her; the bravest and noblest sought her smiles.

From such glowing dreams the girl awoke with a shudder to the cold, stern reality of her life. She lived at last almost entirely in dreamland. There all was fair and charming, while the reality was dull and prossic beyond measure. It was easier for that gifted, artistic, imaginative being to make a world for herself and live in it, than to school her proud spirit to bear patiently the monotony and gloom of her daily life.

Many faults, many errors, must be pardoned her; if there had been any outlet for that ardent imagination, the fatte of Inex Lyane would have been very different. Properly trained and educated, she would have made an artist or an authoress. Her quick, active, glowing fancy would have found legitimate occupation; as it was, it fed apon itself until the girl's whole life became one unreal dream. Even had she known the future that Madame Monteleone destined for her, it would have been better, but that lady, frightened and rendered cantious by her failure with Bianca, said nothing to Inex of Madrid, the court, or the grand mariage she expected to make. "Let it come upon her suddenly," she thought; "and she will all the more probably comply with my wishes."

No word was said to Inex that gave wishes."

No word was said to Inez that gave her any prospect or hopes of brighter days. "I shall live here," she said to herself, "until I am old and wrinkled and cross as grandmamma. What will my life have been?—how shall I bear it through the long years."

and cross as grandmamma. What will be my life have been?—how shall I bear it through the long years?"

Wildly emough she beat against the bars, but all in vain. No bird in a eage was ever more solitary or more sad. Where was the English father of whom she heard ever and anon from the old servants a few mysterious words? Months ago, one day when she had longed more than ever to leave Serranto, she went boldly to Madaune Monteleone, and asked where her father was. Her heart was touched by the stately lady's face, as she folded her in her arms and said, "You are all mine, Inez; you were given to me to be my own, in your mother's place. No one in the wide world cares for you but me."

With her guardian's tears still wet upon her face, the girl lacked courage to say that the love and care given to her in Serranto were not sufficient—that she craved for a fuller life, wherein she might have some pleasure and happiness.

her upon the bed, they found she still breathed.

In hot haste a psysician was summonded from Seville. For many long, weary weeks the poor lady lay between life and death. She recovered at last, but it was to find herself a helpless cripple, and to hear the sad sentence pronounced by the doctor that she would not be able to move without assistance.

When the first shock was over, Madame Mounteleone pondered seriously as to what step she would take with regard to her young grandchild. Common sense and reason told her that she ought to write to Lord Lynne and ask him to take his daughter; but the treasured idea of her life clung to her still, and she could not renounce it. "Something will happen," she said to herself, "I may recover. Doctors are not infallible. In any case, I will keep lnez withme. If she goes to England, she will marry an Englishman, as her mother did, and then farewell forever to the race of Monteleone!" So nothing was written to Lord Lynne, and he never heard either of the accident or of the illness of his daughter's guardian.

Inex found greater liberty and free: "Serranto. Madame Monteleone her during her daughter's lifetime visited, for she knew no one in or near Seville. The friends of her youth twere all far away; most of them resided in Madrid. She had not cared to make the were all far away; most of them resided in Madrid. She had not cared to make the were aller away one use in it. There was ano one there likely to help her in the object for which she lived. Isolated from the world, lnez found her sole pleasure in longing for it and dreaming of it.

This face that had smiled at her with the twivid admiration shining in the dark eyes, was the first of its kind she had seen. It was a dream coming true. The heroes she had made for herself were brave and courteous like him. Would he remember her? Would he ever think of her again? Perhasp not, for he saw beautiful ladies every day. "If ever he rides on the highway again, I wonder whether he will look for me?" she thought.

er of the accident or of the illness of his daughter's guardian.

Inex found greater liberty and free dom than she had ever enjoyed before. Madame Monteleone never left her room. She was too nervous to bear any noise or much conversation. For one hour every morning Inex read to her, and received her instructions as to how the day was to be employed. So many hours were to be given to music, so many to reading, and so many to household employment. The music Inex never missing the reading is the music Inex never missing the reading in the music Inex never missing the reading is the music Inex never missing the reading in the music Inex never missing the reading is the music Inex never missing the second of the music Inex never missing the reading is the music Inex never missing the music Ine ed; it was the one solitary pleasure of her life. When that was over, the rest of the day was all her own. She did not spend it now as she had been obliged to do when Madame Monteleone's quick eyes were upon her, in studying in one of those dull little rooms that looked upon the court-yard. Caterina always sat in Madame's room, and Juanita, who was cook and housekeeper, felt too sorry for the young girl ever to control or betray her movements. So, when the music was ended, and old Caterina safe upstairs, Inex wandered in the grounds of Serranto. The boundary of them was the high road that led to Seville, and the poor child gratified some of her longings by watching the people who passed. Sometimes it would be one of the heroes of her dreams—a cavalier riding at full speed. Carriages, ladies, country people—all and everything had an interest for her. They belonged to, may more, they were part and parcel of that gay world of which she had read and dreamed, but which she had read and dreamed, but which she had reverseen.

and dreamed, but which she had never seen.

Some who passed by noted the beautiful, wisaful face, half hidden by the leaves of the myrtle trees, and wondered who the lovely, high-bred girl could be—what ahe was doing, why she gazed, day after day, with such longing eyes, upon the road that led away to Seville. It was some little break, some change in the almost unendurable monotony. When the evening shadows began to fall, Inca hastened home. No one but Juanita ever saw her enter the house, or knew of the long hours she spent in the grounds.

of the long hours she spent in the grounds.

They were not very extensive, those grounds of Serranto. Time had been when hill, valley, and stream all belonged to the Monteleones. The broad, fertile lands had been sold or forfeited, and little remained of the once large estates; but that little was picturesque and pleasant. The gardens were gorgeous with flowers and fruit. Long groves of orange trees ran by the little stream that found its way into the river near Seville. Large myrtles lent their shade; trees, whose rich and luxurious perfume loaded the air, grew as they would. The grounds were not cultivated; they were ed the air, grew as they would. The grounds were not cultivated; they were beautiful in their rich and luxuriant wildness. The boundary that separated the high road from the grounds was a very frail one—a line of small flowering shrubs. By the shrubs, day after day, there might have been seen a graceful girlish figure. walking slowly, with dreamy, wistful eyes gazing on the high road.

With her guardian's tears still wet upon her face, the girl lacked courage to say that the love and care given to her in Serranto were not sufficient—that she craved for a fuller life, wherein she might have some pleasure and happiness.

So time passed on, and day by day, the wish and longing for some break in her life's monotony grew stronger. The time was to come, and did come, when she looked back to those quiet days with envy and regret—when she would have given beauty and talent, ah, even life itself, to have been once more a dreamy, inmocent child. But no change came; winter and summer, spring and autumn, succeeded one another, and found life the same at Serranto.

"Seventeen years old to-day." said Inez, one bright morning: "I am seventeen: in ten years more I shall be twen ty-seven, and the best part of my life will be over. If something does not happen soon, I shall run away, and make a life for myself."

Little did Madame Montelcone know the bitter, rebellious thoughts of which the proud, beautiful face she watched with growing hope gave no trace.

"You have not been idle, Inez," set said one day, with some complexency, to her grandchild. "You play and sing well: you speak French and I Italian fluently. All accomplishments are useful."

"I know something more than that." repited Inez, triumphantly. "I have taught myself English; I can read every English book in the library: I should very English book in the library: I should which had so greatly startled him. ful." I know something more than that." repiled Irez, triumphantly. "I have taught myself English: I can read every English book in the library: I should be able to speak it in a short time if I went to England." A wistful, sad look came over Madame Monteleone's face.

"It will be useless, my dear child," she said. "You will never see England. There is something for you to do here—a life's task to accomplish." You will never see England. There is something for you to do here—a life's task to accomplish." You will never see England. There is something for you to do here—a life's task to accomplish." You will never see England. There is something for you to do here—a life's task to accomplish." You will never see England. There is something for you to do here—a life's task to accomplish. "You will never see England." She made no reply, but the expression of determination that fell upon her young face might have alarmed Madame Monteleone had she seen it, and caused her to fear for her plans.

Already a change was coming; the one dark cloud that had hung so heavily over her, the gloomy monotony of the girl's life was breaking.

Madame Monteleone, while ascending the stairs, slipped and fell. At first the little household were dreadfully alarmed, and believed, when they saw their lady's still, white face, that she was dead. But, when the servants raised her and laid her upon the bed, they found she still breathed.

Ines knew the plumed hat and the dark face.

With a crimson face and heart beating loudly she concealed hersefl behind a group of trees. She heard how the rider slackened his pace as he drew near the shrubs where he had seen her. He drew rein there, and sat for some minutes looking over the grounds of Sorrento. She could not see the disapponitment that clouded his face; then he turned and galloped back to Seville.

"He came on purpose to see me," she cried to herself. "He looked and waited for me. He has thought of me, just as I have of him."

of opinion between the moderate reformiers, who rely upon the aid of the British Government in carrying out schemes for the betterment of the natives, and the extremists, of the type who caused the recent alarm in Bengal.

The crisis came at to-day's meeting, at which there were nearly two thousand delegates from all parts of India, and some thousands of spectators. The extremists, who are in a large majority, demanded that the resolution extremists, who are in a large majority, demanded that the resolution last year in favor of self-government, nationalism, boycotting of British goods, etc., be included in the agenda for this year. The moderates would not give guarantees and the extremists determined to oppose the election of Dr. Ghose, a moderate, for president. tinuing. An adjournment was taken until to-morrow.

There is talk of a compromise to-night, but the final disruption of the congress into two separate organizations is feared. One of the chief features of the day was the popular reception accorded Laj. Patrai, who was deported by the British Governmnt some time ago, but who was released lately. The crowds in the streets acclaimed him, unhitched the horses attached to his carriage, and drew him in triumph. He received another ovation when he entered the hall where the congress was sitting. The extremists nominated him for the presidency, but he declined the honor.

RENT WAR IN NEW YORK.

Thirty Thousand Families Will Refuse

New York, Dec. 26.—As the result of a movement which has been under way for more than a month, thirty thousand families on the lower east side will refuse to-morrow to pay rent, and if their demands for a reduction are not met wholesale evictions will follow. The Socialist party, with head-quarters in the eighth, fourth and second assembly districts, is directing the revoit against the landlords, claiming the present industrial conditions do not warrant the same rentals that tenants were able to pay a year ago. Four hundred women, organized by Miss Pauline Newmann, have made a house-to-house canvass to obtain written pledges that a reduction of from 20 to 30 per cent. in rent would be demanded, and if this was refused, that no rent would be paid.
