CHAPTER X. A Love Match.

"I shouldn't call that a fault," she said, "and it is not the character she generally bears; but don't think I am speaking against her. Girls will be girls, and you can't put old heads on young shoulders, especially when the heads are so pretty as Becca's. But don't let us waste time talking about her; I want to hear all about yourself—that is, all you care to tell me," and she slid her hand onto Norah's.

"I will tell you everything, but there is very little to tell," said Norah, and she began, shyly at first, to describe her past life and the little cottage on the cliff. Lady Ferndale drew her on, now and again bestowing a gentle pressure on the small hand, and before they had gone a couple of miles, Norah found herself talking to this new friend as if she had known her for years.

As Lord Ferndale often said, his wife would draw the heart out of a stone, if it possessed one.

"And you lived alone with this old servant with the strange name? You must have felt very solitary sometimes, dear. And what a change all this must seem to you!"

"Yes, it was lonely sometimes; but Catherine was not like a servant; she was a second mother to me," said Norah, in a low voice, her head averted. "The change!" she smiled. "It is like a fairy story. It is all so beautiful that it is like a dream. I only wish—"

"Well?" asked Lady Ferndale, with a smile.

"Oh, sometimes I wish that it was not all quite so grand. I am always afraid that I shall make some mistake."

"I am quite sure you haven't," retorted Lady Ferndale, shrewdly. "My dear, you behave as if you were born in the purple. As I told your father, you must have got your manners from him, the best of his. But it is a change! And it will be greater and more striking presently, for we mean to make a great deal of you. You are our latest acquisition, you know, and must expect to be treated to a little lionizing."

Now Wasn't This a Funny Thing to Do? By Dorgan.

"It was no trouble," he said, in his frank, musical voice, which evidently pleased her ladyship, for she smiled upon him graciously.

"Introduce him, dear," she said, in a low voice, as she put the handkerchief in the carriage basket.

Norah bent forward and made the introduction, not blushing now, but with that sweet gravity which Lady Ferndale had noticed and been so quick to admire.

Cyril bowed, and waited to be addressed.

"Lady Norah tells me you are painting some views in Santeigh, Mr. Burne," said Lady Ferndale. "I hope you will not be too exclusive, and that you will not altogether neglect the rest of the locality. Santeigh doesn't monopolize all the picturesque; we have got some of it at Ferndale."

He looked at her, with the pleasant smile in his handsome eyes.

"Dare I take that as a permission?" he said.

"Oh, yes," replied Lady Ferndale, in her open-hearted way. "Lord Ferndale will be delighted if you will paint where you please. He is almost an artist himself."

"I am very fortunate," he said.

It was just the kind of response to gain Lady Ferndale's heart, and she gave a little nod of approval.

"Well, I think you are, to have such a lovely profession, and such lovely places for it," she said. "Good evening."

Cyril paused a moment to set a rein straight that had got crooked, then lifted his hat and stood back. As he did so, he raised his eyes and looked at Norah for a moment—not with the bold stare of the ill-bred, but with a respectful glance—which she responded to with a slight bow, and the carriage drove on.

"I daresay you think me a very eccentric person, to ask you to introduce me to a man who is almost a stranger to you, my dear," she said, with a smile.

"Was it strange?" said Norah, with a little start, as if she were waking from a dream.

"Well, it was a little; but then, you see, I knew that he was a gentleman."

"Why, yes!" said Norah, below her breath.

"Yes; at my age, one is never deceived. One look is enough; and if his face had not proclaimed him, his voice would have done so. But I suppose it was wrong. My husband is always scolding me for what he calls my precipitancy. You mustn't follow my example, but rather take warning by me."

They drove up to the house through a quaint garden in the Dutch style, and Lord Ferndale came down the steps. He was dressed in a white linen suit, with a straw hat, and a smile beamed over his handsome face when he saw who it was his wife had brought home.

"Behold the captive of my bow and spear, Edward," said Lady Ferndale.

"This is a delightful surprise, Lady Norah," he said, taking her hand and holding it with a gentle pressure.

"I'm awfully glad to see you."

The Earl of Arrowdale would have gone to the stake rather than utter such a word in his welcome to a lady, but to Norah it sounded deliciously hearty, and she looked at Lord Ferndale with a shy gratitude in her dark eyes.

Guildford Berton never does anything that one can complain of. And, really, I ought not to prejudice you against him, for you will be sure to see a great deal of him."

So they talked, the elder lady as delighted with Norah as Norah was with her, and after a time they reached a rambling Queen Anne mansion in red brick, looking, as Norah thought, like a picture of Millais' rather than real brick and stone; with the ivy climbing over it, and setting every glistening window in a deep green frame.

"Yes, it's very pretty," said Lady Ferndale, in response to Norah's exclamation of delight; "and of course I'm very fond and proud of it, though it is not nearly so grand a place as yours. I have spent many happy years there," she added, with a little sigh and blush. "Mine was a love match, my dear, and, unlike some love matches, it has turned out very well. I am still in love with my husband, and I think he likes me a little," and she laughed.

They drove up to the house through a quaint garden in the Dutch style, and Lord Ferndale came down the steps. He was dressed in a white linen suit, with a straw hat, and a smile beamed over his handsome face when he saw who it was his wife had brought home.

"Perhaps you met him in London," suggested Norah. Lady Ferndale shook her head doubtfully.

"Perhaps, but I don't think so. Have you made any other acquaintances?" she asked.

Norah told her of the bachelor dinner party on the night of her arrival.

"And I have seen Mr. Guildford Berton since," she said.

She said nothing of the scene between him and Cyril Burne. Somehow it seemed to her as if she had had no right to witness it, and therefore to speak of it.

"Hem! Mr. Guildford Berton," said Lady Ferndale, pursing her lips; "and how did he strike you, dear?"

Norah hesitated, and then said: "I was not very favorably impressed with him."

"Thanks," laughed Lady Ferndale; "I agree with you. Mr. Guildford Berton is not a favorite of mine, and whenever I see him, I always wonder why on earth your father makes so intimate a friend of him. And yet it seems so unjust to express any opinion that's at all adverse, because Mr.

"Surprisingly Good Cough Syrup Made at Home"

Costs Very Little and Easily Made, but is Remarkably Effective.

You'll never really know what a fine cough syrup you can make until you prepare this famous home-made remedy. You not only save $2 compared with the ready-made kind, but you will also have a more effective and dependable remedy in every way. It overcomes the usual coughs, throat or chest colds in 24 hours—relieves even whooping cough quickly.

Get 2 1/2 ounces of Pinex (50 cents worth) from any good drug store, pour it into a 16-oz. bottle and fill the bottle with plain granulated sugar syrup. Here you have 16 ounces—a family supply—of the most effective cough syrup that money can buy—at a cost of only 54 cents or less. It never spoils.

The prompt and positive results given by this pleasant tasting cough syrup have caused it to be used in more homes than any other remedy. It quickly loosens a dry, hoarse or tight cough, heals the inflamed membranes that line the throat and bronchial tubes, and relief comes almost immediately. Sore throat, hoarseness, bronchitis, croup and bronchial asthma.

Pinex is a highly concentrated compound of genuine Norway pine extract, combined with guaiacum and has been used for generations for throat and chest ailments.

Avoid disappointment by asking your druggist for "2 1/2 ounces of Pinex" with full directions, and don't accept anything else. A guarantee of absolute satisfaction or money promptly refunded goes with this preparation. The Pinex Co., Toronto, Ont.
