St. George is Exposed at Last

The editor of the Maidstone, Sask., "Mirror," in giving his reasons for wishing to discard the Union Jack in favor of some other design, says that "Saint" George was a low parasite who got a paying contract to supply the army with bacon; that he was a rascal and informer; that he became rich through nefarious dealings; was eventually dragged to prison (none too soon it is apparent) and eventually got his just deserts by being lynched.

So there you are. Another dream of our youth knocked into a cocked hat. Of course we are quite unable to follow the editor of "The Mirror" in this matter, for we can be candid to the point of stating that we have been unable to decide who St. George was anyhow. The best we can say is that somewhere he got mixed up with a dragon, whatever that was (perhaps it was a source of his bacon supply).

However, it serves us right for taking on a foreigner. He was not an Englishman, but appears to have come from somewhere out of the East and was only adopted by England centuries after the bacon incident and the

Lame Girl Cured by Prayer

IRON BRACE DROPS FROM LEG AS SHE MAKES NOVENA IN CAMBRIDGE, MASS.

Paralyzed during the ravaging infantile paralysis epidemic in 1916, Mary McIntyre, 11 years old, of No. 59 Otis Street, Cambridge, was cured as if by a miracle when an iron brace broke in two and fell from her leg onto the street almost in front of the Sacred Heart Church in East Cambridge, where she was making a novena to St. Theresa, the "Little Flower of Jesus," for her recovery.

The brace which supported her paralyzed legs is now in the Church of the Sacred Heart before the altar of Saint Theresa, to whom the little girl offered special devotion and prayer, joined by Rev. Hugh F. Blunt, "the poet pastor" of her church.

The sisters of the Order of St. Joseph, by whom she was taught in the Sacred Heart parochial school, and many of the parishioners prayed long and often for the recovery of the little girl.

A novena, which is nine days' devotion, was started by Fr. Blunt, who has a special devotion to "The Little Flower," and has written many poems about the saint, in the Sacred Heart Church recently. Little Mary decided to offer it for the intention of securing a cure, and asked her family to join her.

Every morning before the altar little Mary, with her father and mother, offered prayers for her recovery. Monday morning, Sept. 28th, assisted by her mother, as was usual, with her school chum, Isabella Kennedy, she started for school. Almost opposite the church she cried:

"Oh! Ma! my brace is hurting me!" She almost dropped in the street, but was caught by her mother and chum.

Mrs. McIntyre says that at that time a strange feeling came over her—a feeling that she had never experienced before. She inspected the brace and found that it was broken just below the knee. There was no trace of an imperfection in the iron, according to her mother.

Mrs. McIntyre said to her daughter, "You will never wear it again. St. Theresa has cured you."

The child left the brace off and has not needed it since. This morning she walked to church and received communion unassisted.

Mr. John Byrne, son of Head Constable Byrne, in a letter to his mother verifies the story as told above by a Boston paper. He lives near the McIntyre family and is acquainted with the little girl. At a service following her cure she was seated inside the Sanctuary rails, and over three thousand people crowded the church to see her.

In the Fire Fiend's Grip

THE SMOKE OF A FOREST FIRE IS AS GOOD AS A DINNER INVITATION TO THE WATCHFUL HAWK.

When a travelling managerie caught fire near Bedale recently, the only animal that could not be rescued was a kangaroo, which fought so furiously with the men who tried to drag it out that it had to be abandoned.

While most living creatures fear fire they do not all behave alike in case of a sudden outbreak. Some bolt madly away; but to others there is a fascination in flame, and they will actually walk into it.

Horses in a burning stable are extremely difficult to handle. They go crazy with terror, and kick and plunge and scream. It is next to impossible to get them out, the only way being to blindfold them. Then, and then only, will they submit to be led out. Yet even horses can be trained to overcome their terror of fire. The writer has ridden a Texan pony through miles of grass fire, and everyone knows how steady were the horses that drew the old-fashioned fire-engines in all the glare and heat of a great City conflagration.

Nine Lives Useless.

Cats behave oddly in case of fire. Instead of running away, a cat will often hide in the corner of a burning room, and so perish. In such a case the animal seems stupefied. There are, however, notable exceptions, for cats have been known to rouse their owners when fire has broken out during the night.

Dogs are almost the only animals that keep their wits in an outbreak, and, unless penned behind a closed door or in an upper room, a dog seldom loses its life in a fire. There are scores of cases of dogs giving the alarm of fire by barking, or even by jumping on their masters' beds and scratching them awake.

Cage birds are paralyzed by fire; but the hawk tribe seize upon a common or forest fire as an occasion for a feast. They hover above the smoke, ready to seize upon any unfortunate small bird that is blindly trying to make its escape.
