The Braes of Yarrow

An Historical Tale of the Sixteenth Century.

The Queen advanced slowly to her, and to the amazement of every one attempted to raise her kindly from her kneeling posture. "But as Margaret Barras and Spens, my friend, my companion, and my follower, I prove how well I have remembered you by promising that for eight weeks from this day you shall live under my protection to go and come as you list. At the end of that period I trust you shall have found the proofs that will cleanse your husband's honor of the black stain now resting on it. But whether you have found them or not, I must then complete my duty to the State and resign you to other hands. Rise now; for a little while we are friends again."

Lady Spens could only grasp the hands which were given to her in token of protection and friendship, and kiss them with tearful gratitude.

The unexpected termination of an address which had begun so ominously took all present by surprise—a surprise as happily appeared for the most part to have given satisfaction, although one or two countenances expressed doubt of the propriety of what had been done.

"My lords," said her Majesty as she was about to retire, "I trust you will make known my humor in this matter; and for the time I have mentioned I will be bounden for this lady's safe keeping."

"I pray you, my liege, hear this matter to an end," broke in Angus hastily.

"I have heard enough for the present, and I have spoken my will."

"None here can pity the lady's position more than I—none would be more willing to help her to her desire, but Justice must be done. The accuser of her husband and herself is within call—"

"Ha, say you; let us see the man."

"First let this be understood, that I have promised him safe passage."

"Concerning that we will speak after."

"He carries also the safe passage of the Council, for, to avoid the evil that might follow upon the revelation of his crime, his person must be unknown, unless your Majesty will consent to see the man in presence only of their lordships."

"Bring him hither, I say," was the impatient ejaculation of the Queen; "by my oath, my Lord Angus, it seems that you would have your best and not mine followed."

"Your Majesty shall be obeyed."

The said made a sign to one of the pages, and presently a man entered whose dress of coarse materials would have indicated that he belonged to the peasantry, but whose bearing was firm and bold as that of one accustomed to joust and saddle.

His face was covered by a cloth mask, and as if to conceal it as he knelt before the Queen, he bowed his head down low.

The Queen turned from him with a certain degree of contempt in her manner.

"My Lord Arran, question the fellow."

"Speak, sirrah," said Arran gruffly, "what proof have you of this accusation?"

"The proofs, your lordship knows, have been already given to the Council."

"Then what seek you here?"

"This only—that to satisfy all men I have spoken honestly, I denounce in the Queen's presence, Spens of Halstane a traitor to his King and country; and swear that I hold full proof that his lady was aware of his treachery. On this I stake my life, and will uphold my words in the lists against any man the lady will find bold enough to defend her cause."

"My liege, my liege," cried Lady Spens hastily, "this is—"

"Hush—let us hear the end."

"I take your challenge for my lady's sake, liar and villain though you be."

The accuser sprang to his feet and turned fiercely upon the speaker.

It was Gilbert Elliott who had advanced from his position near the door and stood confronting the accuser.

"You speak brave enough," said the latter sneering.

"And, with the saint's help, will do what I say. Walter Spens of Halstane is innocent of all thought or word or deed of treachery, and his lady is blameless as the Queen herself. In this fellow who denounces them behold Adam Scott of Tushielaw."

As he spoke he plucked the mask from Tushielaw's face.

"Fiends burn you," uttered the Borderer below his breath.

"Tushielaw," continued Gilbert calmly, "the riever, outlaw, and murderer, who seeks to shield himself from the consequences of his guilt by casting the blame upon innocent shoulders. I denounce him before your Majesty and your lordships, and I am ready when and where you list to prove my words upon his body."

"Agreed," cried Tushielaw.

"To-morrow, then, let this matter be decided," said the Queen.

Accompanied by her ladies, and taking Lady Spens with her, the Queen withdrew.

Tushielaw bowed to the nobles and seemed anxious to retire. Arran stopped him.

"Stay, Scott, you must first come one who will be surety for your appearance to-morrow."

"You need not fear that I will fail."

"Nathless, we must have the surety."

"My Lord Angus, then, will answer for me."

"Angus," exclaimed Arran, raising his heavy eyebrows, "is this so, my lord?"

"I will answer for him," said Angus curtly as he wheeled about and retired, followed by Tushielaw.

"For you, Master Elliott, we do not doubt that, as a gentleman, the Queen's Guard, you will fulfill your engagement."

Gilbert saluted their lordships and left the chamber.

A FIGHT IN EARNEST.—A short time ago in the township of Adelaide, County of Middlesex, a terrible encounter took place between two young men. There had been a chronic feud between them, and happening to meet one proposed that they should go into the field and have it out. They accordingly went at it "rough and tumble," and one received so much roughing and tumbeling that he has since died from the injuries.

DESIRABLE, IF POSSIBLE.—Woodstock intends trying how it will go to have a half holiday every Friday during the summer months. There will probably be some difficulty in carrying out the intention.

CHEESE.—The Messrs. Hager have again commenced their cheese factory in Palermo, and are now manufacturing 2,500 lbs of milk daily.

The residence of J. Carnegie, Esq., at Bradford, was ransacked by thieves on Thursday morning, while the family were asleep. They carried off a splendid alarm clock, a lady's gold watch and chain, electro-plated tea and coffee pot, silver spoons and other articles, in all worth $150.

A party of roughs fired revolvers at the Volunteers on duty at the drill shed in Bradford on Thursday night. They were pursued, but not captured.

The Globe's Ottawa despatch says Mr. McGill's name is no longer spoken of for a place in the Cabinet. Ministerialists say he could not be elected, and a Reform Senator is to succeed Mr. Howland.

The store of T. P. White, Esq., Whitevale, was broken open and robbed of $366 on Thursday night last. The safe was blown open.

THE EIGHT HOURS SYSTEM.—The U. S. Senate has passed a law making eight hours a legal day's work for all government laborers and mechanics in the United States service.

Two men are going about the county of Hastings asking farmer's names who grow "harrack," (common wild mustard) and then, on returning, prosecute them, receiving half the penalty.
