Mr. Hyman went on to criticise the National Policy, the burden it imposed on the country and on the consumer, reaching the enormous proportions of an annual tax of between $8,000,000 and $9,000,000; he denounced the tariff for taxing expensive veivets and fine goods less than it taxed the coarse and cheap goods consumed by the mass of the people. He defined the Liberal policy for unrestricted reciprocity, and declared that the Liberals believed they could negotiate a satisfactery treaty with the United States, and if they could not negotiate an honorable treaty they would make none at all. (Cheers.) Both parties were, however, pledged to reciprocity, it was simply a question of degrees and how far each would go. According to the Ministerialists it was loyal to sell a chicken to the United trates and disloyal to sell them a baby carriage. It was loyal to sell them a pumpkin, disloyal to sell them chewing gum. (Laughter.) Where, Mr. Hyman asked, does their loyalty start and where does it end. Did it start with a mule which could be exchanged under the old reciprocity treaty and end in a cake of soap, which would be included in a new reciprocity treaty, did it start at butternilk and end in a cake of soap, which would be included in a new reciprocity treaty, did it start at butternilk and end in a leadership. Did it start with a mule which could be exchanged under the old reciprocity treaty and end in a cake of soap, which would be included in a new reciprocity treaty, did it start at butternilk and end in molasses? (Laughter.) The chief thing, however, which concerned the Ministerialists was not reciprocity, but the question of leadership. They knew the nominal leader, but who was the actual chief?
