It is well that the rights of both parties are defined by written documents. The title of France to Miquelon is as little disputed as the right of the United States to the penalty which was iniquitously assessed at Geneva. The text is perfectly plain in the treaty of Utrecht, which recognizes as belonging to the English crown the undivided sovereignty of Newfoundland. No encroachments of French fishermen can have extended rights which deneed wholly on treaty.

That Newfoundland to preserve her integrity must begin, independently of England, to gesist the French marauders is a corollary from the colonial history cited above.
