When every rood of ground a motate dies man

"God speed the plough !"-be this a prayer To find its echo every where: But curses on the iren hand That grasps one rood of " common land. Sure there's enough of earth beside, Held by the sons of Wealth and Prole, Their glebe is wide enough without Our " commons" being fenced about

We guard the spot where steeples rise In stately granden to the skies We mark the place where altars shine, As hallow'd, samted, and divine; And just as sacred should we hold-The sod where peasants—blythe and bold— Can plant their footsteps day or night, In free, unquestioned, native right.

The Common range—the Common range— Oh! guard it from invading change; Though rough, 'tis rich—tho' poor, 'fis blest, And will be while the skylark's nest And early violets are there, Filling with sweetness earth and air.

It elads the eve it warms the soul To gaze upon the regged knoll, Where taugled brushwood twines across The straggling brake and sedgy moss. Oh! who would give the black thorn lea: es For harvest's full and rustling sheaves? *
Oh! who would have the grain spring up Where now we find the daisy's cup. Where clumps of dark red heather gleam With beauty in the summer beam-And yellow furze-bloom laughs to scorn Your ripen'd hops and bursting corn:

"God speed the plough!" but let us trace Something of Nature's infant face; Let us behold some spot where man Has not yet set his " bar and ban;" Leave us the green wastes, fresh and wild, For poor man's beast and poor man's child.

A Hint to Mathers.—We have often been grieved to hear the ribald manner in which delicate subjects were spoken of by mothers in the presence of their daughters, some of them certainly thought too young to understand the topic of conversation; but if these ladges had looked more to the effect of their marrative on their offspring, they would have been somewhat startled to witness the distention of the son of th

There is something grand in the outward circumstances of a storm; it is within, in the res angustac domi, that the borrors of the gale are fea in their full effect.
