

The John Price Jones Corporation, 3.

We have a number of graduates of Dalhousie on our professional staff at McGill and I frequently hear them discussing their Alma Mater, and the opinion amongst them seems to be that the University is not the institution to which all the credit should be given for the success of its graduates. Most of them seem to think, at any rate I have heard some of them say, that the credit is really due to a small group of very superior secondary schools, usually called academies, or perhaps most of all to the people of the community itself who have always had and still have a remarkable devotion to the education of the young men and women in the Province. Whether this estimate is scientific or not it is impossible for me to say. The suggestion, however, is one which seems to me to be very pertinent to any fair appraisal of the position of a University in its community.