A CARD.
D. K. MINOR
PRESENTS his compliments to those gentlemen and friends who have for several years been sustaining the publications which he has issued during the last three or four years. He feels under peculiar obligations to those who have contributed to their support, either as subscribers, or contributors to their columns; and especially so to those who have exerted their influence to extend their circulation. In return for these favors, and the indulgence with which his frequent delays and want of punctuality have been treated, he can only return his thanks and express his gratitude; and in relation to the future, say that no effort on his part will be omitted, which will tend to render the works useful to those for whom they are designed, and interesting and profitable to those who patronize them; and he assures those who may be willing to continue their patronage, that, notwithstanding the loss, by the late conflagration, of almost his entire establishment, including the back volumes of all his works, stereotype plates, and printing materials, to the amount of near nine thousand dollars.—With a view of rendering the Mechanics' Magazine more valuable to its readers, he will re-publish in it, during the ensuing year, Nicholson's small treatise on Architecture, with 41 pages of Engravings, illustrating the different orders of Architecture, which, at itself costs three dollars a copy—together with some other rare and costly works.
