IN THE HOP FIELDS.

Hop-picking was always a gala time at Pendexter farm.

Far away the golden haze hung over the hills like a quivering vail; the bland air was full of the soft, subtle fragrance of wild grapes ripening in the woods; and wherever dead tree or rude stone wall afforded it a vantage ground, the silvery tangles of clematis wove a lovely garland, and tall masses of golden-rod and purple-fringed asters held up their clusters of dazzling bloom. And in the hop fields merry voices echoed from morning until night.

Will Pendexter, walking up and down the isles of silver-green leafage, with his hinds behind his back, might have reminded one of Boaz in the ancient Scripture story—princely Boas standing in his harvest fields and giving a kind glance and pleasant word to everyone.

"Isn't he handsome?" said little Fanny Dix to Miss Morgan, the rector's daughter. Fanny was a pale little dressmaker, with an incipient cough, who had been recommended by her doctor to spend a fortnight in the hop fields; and Miss Morgan, whose mother had died of consumption, picked hops every year on principle, just as Judge Marley's daughters visited Long-Branch. "And all the handsomer since he has turned gray? I do wonder why he never married?"

Don't you know?" said Miss_Morgan, sagely.

genuine romance. "Because his first love jilted him."

"As if anyone would jilt Will Pendexter," said incredulous Fanny.

"Oh, but he wasn't Squire Pendexter then—all this happened twenty years ago," averred Miss Morgan, her flying fingers never leaving off among the clusters of pale-green hops. "That was before he inherited Pendexter farm. He was only a poor young farmer then, with his own living to make, and this was a beautiful girl who was spending the summer here. And they were engaged and all—and the very night before the wedding she ran away with an Italian, one Count Caprivi, who was on the New York stage."

Fanny drew a long breath.

"And what became of them," said she.

"Oh, they went to Italy where the count expected to succeed to large estates, and I suppose they are there estates, and I suppose they are there now."

Fanny looked with secret awe at the ruddy face and magnificent height of Will Pendexter, as he sauntered down the green aisles of waving tendrils and tremulous leaves, and almost wondered to hear him ask Mahala Bentley about her baby in the off-hand, ordinary language of every day life, and give lame Billy Bartlett "good day," just as if there had been no Countess Caprivi in the world.

But Fanny Dix was but a girl yet; she

But Fanny Dix was but a girl yet; she did not know how twenty years will bridge over the darkest gulf in a human life. There is no scar that will not heal in twenty years—there is not a grave on which grass will not grow—aye, and daisies bloom, in twenty years.

"I don't know that we can take another hand, Simpson," said Squire Pendexter, meditatively. "The field is growydd already."

Pendexter, meditatively.

"What I though, exactly, sir," said the overseer, respectfully. "But this 'ere is a pretty young slip of a girl, with a feeble mother dragging along on her arm. And a man doesn't like to say 'no' to such! So I thought I'd just speak to you, before—"

"Where are they?" said the squire. rubbing the gold knob of his walking cane against his nose; and Simpson knew that the case of the forlorn strangers was safe enough.

"Mother, don't fret; here comes the gentleman pow," said a clear, self toned voice, and Squire Pendexter found himself looking into a pair of wistful, deepwould I chose that mode of locomotion.

"I don't want you to work cheap!" said the squire, assuming an aspect of unwonted grufiness to cover the sympathetic thrill in his voice. "I never grudged money's worth for good, honest work. As for the barn, my housekeeper can put you in one of the vacant back chambers over the kitchen, and there's always enough to eat at Pendexter farm!"

"But, mother, why?" soothed the girl, who scarcely, as yet, comprehended all this by-play. "Don't you hear what the gentleman says? We can have work ere and food and shelter! Mother, sit lown again! You are trembling all over!"

"I tell you, child, you don't know!"
said impatient Clara, possessed with a sort of wild, unreasoning terror. "We we must go!"

"Clara," said the squire, when she had finished, "why didn't you come to me?"

"Because I had wronged you so deeply," she falterel.

"You might have known I would have been kind, even to Caprivi's child. Well, it doesn't matter now. You are here, and you must stay here. Do you hear me, Clara? Must! Bless my heart! You'll grow stronger in these country breezes, and that pale girl of yours will get a color in her face."

"Clara," said the blunt squire one day. "that girl of yours is prettier than ever you were."

"I know it," said Madam Caprivi. And as she spoke the words a pang of jealousy struck sharply through her heart. Yet, was it not natural enough that Squire Pendexter should take note of Isora's opening loveliness?

And in her room that night Clara wrested with her own heart and conquered it.

"He will marry Isora," she told herself. "Isora is beautiful, and he is in the prime of life. It is as it should be. While I—I am only a wreek, waiting on the shores of time for the final billow to come and sweep me away. God bless his noble heart! God bless my sweetsouled girl! And God grant that they may be happy together for many, many long and happy years!"

The squire came to Madam Caprivi the next day, with rather an embarrassed face. It's better to keep an even temper than to 'get even" with your enemies. It's better to walk six miles a day than to die sixteen years too early.

She held out ner hand with a smile.

"Should I be making a fool of myself if, at my age, I were to marry?"

"You would be doing the most proper and natural thing in the world," Clara answered, still smilling, although her heart seeme I to stand still within her.

"Then, by Jove, I'll risk it!" said the squire, jubiliantly. "Clara, will you have me? Shall we begin our disjointed lives over again, my girl?" I had been told that if I wished to make him go to the right I must hit him on the left side of the head with a very short side, with which I had been provided for the purpose. But that was more easily said than done. How was I, from my giddy perch, to reach the creature's head across that long stretch of neck? I tried it and nearly lost my balance for my pains—no joke at the height of some ten feet above the pebbly sand. One of the officers, however, saw my plignt, stop ped, uttered some gurling sounds, and then the camel, exposing its teeth and protesting vigorously, knelt down and I dismounted, vowing that never again would I chose that mode of locomotion.
