"I was hunting upon one of the forks of the Yellowstone. There was a dozen of us in the party, all jolly fellows; and as we were lucky, we had as good a time as ever a party need to ask for.

"It chanced one day, when we had been encamped for over a week in the same spot, that I got separated from the rest of the party. I had shot at a deer and only wounded it, and it led me along chase before I was able to draw sight on it again and dring it down.

"Having done so at length, I set to work to strip off its hide, and then cut out the best pieces to carry to the camp. "My mind had been so taken up with the wounded deer that I had paid but little heed to the way I was going, and now when I was about to set out for the camp. I tor the first time looked about me to take my bearings. The more I looked, the more confused I got. For the life of me I couldn't tell which was the way to the camp.
