MEN FORGET THEY ARE CIVILIZED MEN DEATH GRIP IN THE TRENCHES

An Account of Some Phases of Warfare as Seen by an Officer of Canadian Expeditionary Forces

New York, Aug. 17.—One of the Canadian war heroes who has aroused the admiration of Americans is that dashing Scot Lieutenant Colonel Percy Albert Guthrie commander of the 236th Battalion, Canadian Expeditionary Force, popularly known as "The Maclean Killies" of America.

Tall, splendidly built, and with his head held high, Colonel Guthrie is a striking picturesque figure in his khaki. He was the first recruit in Canada and has been twenty-two times wounded. Even when engaged in a mere recruiting expedition, which is the mission that brought him to the United States, his gallant carriage and the quick decision of his manner mark him as a magnificent leader of men, able both to inspire and to direct them.

Although he usually possesses an almost boyish exuberance of spirits, this Canadian officer has moments of poignant remembrance of the horrors through which he has passed. It is at such times that he recalls a certain English Westphalian officer, Lieutenant Colonel Guthrie will not talk for publication but Mr. Charles K. Howard, representative of the Canadian government at the railway and his close friend and executor, has given the story:

"On a night in the battle of Festubert the Tenth Canadians went over the trenches. The flares from the machine guns made the line light as day. A piece of the German trench was taken. The only injury that the Colonel sustained in the scrap received were some tears in the legs from barbed wire entanglements, although he lost in three-quarters of an hour two-thirds of his battalion. The piece that was taken must be held until reinforcements came. These were a little slow in arriving. A captain held on to the trench while the Colonel, leading his men down the trenches, with his bombers cleared out another section. The German line began to give slowly. Step by step they backed around the traverses toward Givenchy. The Canadians gathered their strength and started to press forward. Step by step Westphalians tried to hold his men the stem the tide. He stood up in his knees in mud, fighting until his last bomb was gone. The night was upon them, with the piece that light, which had died down now, the Colonel, at the head of his men, rushed upon the little Westphalian officer, trying to bayonet him. He found less than the Colonel, was not daunted. He grasped the Colonel by both arms, holding him for a moment, and then with the strength born of despair, lifted him bodily into the air, holding him rigid so that he could not move.

"The Canadians, dashing on behind, over-balanced the struggling pair, so that the poor little Westphalian officer fell backward into the mud, with the Colonel on top. In the dark Canadian soldiers did not know whether their leader had been killed or not. They did not take time to investigate. They rushed over the two struggling men, tramping them deeper and deeper into the mire of the trench. The blood just was upon them. Their bloodshot eyes sought through the darkness the bloodshot eyes of the enemy. The narrow trench prevented them from using their bayonets or their rifles, so they threw their rifles away and, taking their bayonets in their hands, fought around the traverses of the trench. The Colonel found the throat of the German officer. The struggle was soon over, so that he could catch up with his men.

"Many hands to hand conflicts took place that night. The men grappled with each other, and in times like these when strong men meet and struggle one of them must give his life. A young Canadian reached for the eyes of the opponent putting them out, while hungry fingers reach for the loose flesh beneath the chin. The knees and the vulnerable part of the other man and the teeth do their share of this madman's work, in which men forget that they are civilized and once again become primitive in the art of war.

"Through these struggles the Colonel passed, and while he forgot the other encounters he was in there lingered in his heart a touch of pity and reverence for the brave little man from across the Rhine who had fought against great odds but whose luck was against him. He sought out in the mire of the trench the cold form of the little hero. He carefully wiped the froth of blood from his nostrils and carried him into a dug-out by himself, where he might rest until properly interred. He gazed with tears upon the sunken, swollen jaws of the man, whose unshaven lips, the wrinkled temples—gazed until burned in his memory there will always be that face to haunt him through his life.

"The noble face of a brave man who fought well; the face that he will see in the corner of his room in the night time and he will be sure when he thinks of the trenches and the war.

"He wondered who this person might be and searching found in his pocket a picture of a woman. It was the same man upon his wedding day. Upon the back of the picture he found three newspaper clippings in German which a British officer translated. The first ceeding days the fighting surged back and forth over Ypres' hillsides, during which time the battalion suffered greatly from the gas clouds that were let loose now and then.

"One time when leading his men the Colonel fell with a bayonet wound in his chin. On another occasion his nose was broken, but this did not put him out of action. He suffered from the concussion of a shell on another occasion and was knocked out for five hours. On another day he was put out of business by a gas shell which exploded near him and was dragged out of a ditch filled with water by a British general, who forced him to emit the gas by thrusting his fingers down his throat. A scar on the knee shows where the Colonel was punctured by a bayonet point. His hand was ripped open by a bayonet which he held while grappling with an assailant. The outcome of it was that the Canadians held the line at Ypres until reinforcements came.

"We have been prone to think here that Germany was a little bit ahead in ingenuity in the modern methods of war, but the Colonel told us how our people got onto the job and put one over.

Jack Moran, aged 11 son of Capt. Moran, of the Dupont, Wallaceburg made a heroic rescue of his nine-year-old brother, who had fallen in the water.
