THE FAIR IMPOSTOR.
CHAPTER XXII.
QUITE HARMLESS.

coat, and the handsome face would fade, and go like the vision in a dream.

Often Sir Talbot would sit beside them, or walk to and fro talking to Dawson Slade, and always amused and delighted; at other times all the visitors—for the house was filling for the shooting—would stand and watch the picture; but it happened sometimes that the two were alone, and it was then that the spell fell on her and the gallery would fade away and give place to a vision of the still street, and the passionate, pleading man, in his evening dress, and white, steadfast face.

Was it pleasure or pain? She could not say; but for certain, his presence brought a vague sense of protection with it.

He was her slave; he had said it, her slave to do her bidding, to serve and protect her to the death.

And she was not unhappy.

Sometimes at night a sense of her position, of the fearful life of deception and of crime—for that morning at the bank she had committed forgery—smote her, and made her white with dread and desperation; but still she was not unhappy.

The pallor left her; gradually she began to show an interest in all the many schemes for her amusement; began to look upon the great boxes which came filled with the choicest examples of Monsieur Worth's art with pleasure and interest.

Sir Talbot spared no pains or expense to give expression to the dotting love which he entertained for her. Nothing was too good for her—there was, indeed, in his eyes, scarcely anything on earth good enough. Her pointers, her black mare, were the admiration of the county. The duchess herself was not more nobly dressed and the Woodleigh jewels—which for twenty years had lain hidden in their caskets—were the wonder whenever she wore them, though that was very seldom; for, notwithstanding Sir Talbot loved to see her glittering in diamonds, with the Woodleigh rubys glowing on her white throat, she always put them on reluctantly.

"Are you not fond of jewels?" said Sir Talbot. "I thought they were the one thing on earth your sex were harmonious in approving. You don't seem to care about them, my darling."

"I like them," she said, running the string of diamonds over her white fingers like a stream of water sparkling in the sunlight. "Yes, I like them. They are beautiful—too beautiful for me," and she leaned her face against him.

"There's nothing on earth too beautiful for you!" exclaimed the old man.

And always, just before she entered the gallery—where he stood, the light of the oriel window falling on his handsome face and his loose, velvet, painting jacket—her white hand would go to her bosom, as if to still the beating of her heart, and her lovely face would set itself, as it were, in a mold of calm serenity.

She scarcely knew whether it was with pleasure or pain that she looked forward to meeting him. Sometimes she felt that he exercised a certain and positive fascination over her. He stopped in his work and looked at her, her eyes felt drawn to his; when he spoke, all inner sense was on the alert to catch the words that fell so softly musical from his lips.

Never a word, never a hint of the past dropped from his lips, but sometimes when she raised her eyes under the spell of his, she would see a passionate gleam of patient longing and desire of love shining in their depths, and then her heart beat, and a warm mist seemed to fall on her and envelop her, and the figure in its velvet and her maid, who stood discreetly at a distance, when recounting the incident in the servants hall, that Sir Talbot's eyes filled with tears. "Nothing! Wear them, my darling, they were your—your mother's, and—and and I like to see you wear them."

She turned away from him with a sudden sigh, and standing meekly, allowing him to fasten the glittering gems round her snowy throat. That night there was a dinner party at the Priory, where her exquisite beauty outshone Laura Warner's, even as the Woodleigh diamonds outshone all other jewels in the room.

Between Harold and herself the same reserve still remained unbroken, though all the county linked their names together, no word of love, or anything approaching it, was exchanged between them; since that first night when Harold had offended her all that would surely be his, the title and the estates, and she had turned coldly away, she had kept him at arm's length. She herself lived, as it were, in a dream, and knew not which way the winding, devious path on which she had ventured would lead her. And so the days wore on, each bringing some fresh triumph to Sir Talbot's daughter, and adding fresh fuel to the smoldering fire of little Laura Warner's jealous envy.

One morning—the morning after the dinner at the Priory—that young lady rose, tired and in anything but a pleasant humor as she looked at her pale face, pinched with the effects of last night's excitement and disappointment; for she, who had been the belle until Lillian Woodleigh's appearance, had been shown completely in the shade; beside the superb beauty of Lillian, poor Laura looked insignificant.

shown so much curiosity respecting Lillian Woodleigh at the bank. When she did, she sat watching him as, with the coolest nonchalance, he deliberately fished away as if the water were his own special property.

Fast Motor Boats.
London, Aug. 6.—Two of the British challengers for the international motor boat race for the Harmsworth Cup, belonging respectively to the Duke of Westminster and Daniel Hanbury, were shipped to New York on the steamship Minnetonka which sailed today. The Duke of Westminster's boat has an engine of 400 horse power. The race will be run August 20th over the Larchmont Yacht Club course.

The Crippen Case.
No Hitch Has Developed in Extradition of the Prisoners to England.
Quebec, Aug. 10.—Dr. Crippen and Miss Le Neve will leave here for England on the 16th instant. All the papers relative to their extradition have been received and the only thing that is holding back now is the expiration of the term of imprisonment here. All stories which have been circulated stating that difficulties had arisen between Inspector Dew and the authorities were denied this morning, and the officials state positively that there was never a hitch of any kind.
