in the hands of the Queen who had accepted them.

Referring to Mr. Campbell-Bannerman, Sir William said he would take it upon himself to say that no abler, more respected or popular minister—(cheers from both sides)—had ever filled the office. The course of the Opposition, he declared, had disabled the War Minister from proceeding with the army estimates and had made it impossible for the Government to obtain votes of supply absolutely necessary to the service of the country. The Government, he said, would hold office only until their successors had been appointed and he, therefore, would move that the House adjourn; but it was indispensable before this was done that the Behring Sea bill be passed, in order that it might receive the royal assent.

Harcourt's Closing speech.

In quitting office Sir William Vermon Harcourt said he relinquished a post which he had always regarded as a great responsibility, as carrying with it higher obligations than that of any other position under the Crown, and he had always desired to maintain the ancient dignity of this famous assembly in the performance of the duties of that arduous office under circumstances of no ordinary difficulty. He had had great assistance and he desired to tender to the gentlemen with whom he had had the tesy which had invariably been shown
