

lands and lands
of the
pleasant, and
cool, that the
rivers from the
lands, which
and broad vast
here the land
the mountains
has in some places, oak of
ance.

the country
ingable a coun-
p by the river
side at its en-
in its course
; the most
of Orleans,
soil of which
uces in abun-
common to
es in length,
ch, while in epresented the
e difficult and
e found to be
o difficulty in

the river is low
o considerable
hich run from
o the country
t of the two
herever rivers
on each side to
ntains is called

s, bears, foxes,
s, rabbits, and

resembles the
rns. The In-
al, and imagine
e and long life,
e upon grass in
hen they herd
very near him
furtiously on his
o prevent this,
hile the delu-
es proper mea-

elk; and, not-
ize, often make
disengage him-
water.

ing with greater
alliance with a
it one day, is
e who has ren-
upplying them
ode during the
nd, as they lay
e feafon.

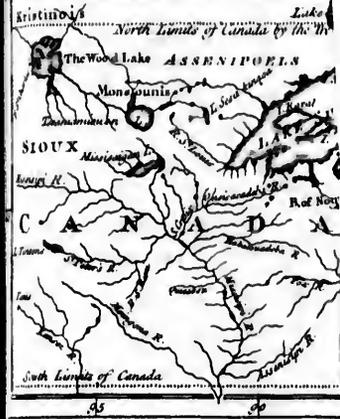

when wounded
elves very poor
at dangerous to
nd they recover

They are very
When provi-
ture out among
of the Indian-
their chief wea-
y will hug any

on, and called
punt of its emit-
s distance, when
purpued

SUPPLEMENT for the LAKES

fort, in which the governor resides. Opposite the Recollects have handsome houses, and on the right is the cathedral, which is built in a mean stile, but has a large, high, and well-built tower, that may be seen at a great distance. Over-against this is the Jesuits college, which is a fine building; and between them are well-built-houses. The house of the Knights Hospitallers is a stately structure, with two fine pavilions. In the second square are two descentes to the river of St. Charles, an hospital called Hotel-Dieu is in the midway, and from thence are smaller houses, which reach to that of the intendant. On the other side of the Jesuits college is a pretty long street, in which is a nunnery. Almost all the houses are built of stone, and there are above seven thousand inhabitants. Besides the Lower and Higher Towns, there is another beyond the latter, on the banks of the river St. Charles, along which are several noble country seats.

the English admiral was directed to fall down in the night, and protect the landing of the forces; this he punctually performed. On the twelfth of September, at one in the morning, the first embarkation, consisting of four complete regiments, the light infantry, commanded by colonel Howe, a detachment of Highlanders, and the American grenadiers, was made in flat-bottomed boats, under the immediate command of the brigadiers Monck-ton and Murray, though general Wolfe accompanied them in person, and was one of the first who landed; and they began to fall down with the tide to the intended place of disembarkation, rowing close along the north shore, in order to find it the more easily. The boats glided gently along without any disorder; but by the rapidity of the tide, and the darkness of the night, they overthot the mark, and the troops landed a little below the place intended.