

Helena." Much indebted to a clean and healthy hospital, a kind and tender doctor, with gentle yet nourishing food, for being made sufficiently strong to undertake the voyage; but our sickness had made so deep an inroad on our constitutions, that it would take a very long time before we could be entirely well.

Twelve days brought us to Napoleon's late exile, St. Helena. Nothing having occurred on the passage, but on passing a brig two pigeons left her, and remained with us as passengers until our arrival here, when they returned to their own home.
