

HIS EXCELLENCE'S REPLY.

Lord Lansdowne, in reply, thanked them all for the enthusiastic welcome they had given him. He did not think his visit would have been a formal one, and he did not expect such a gratifying reception as they had been pleased to give him. He thanked them also for associating his visit with the Jubilee year, an event which called forth a spontaneous feeling of loyalty and affection to Her Majesty throughout all her wide dominions. Mr. Dobb, in his speech, had been kind enough to suggest that he, the speaker, should address a few words of counsel and encouragement to the students. Regarding counsel, he was afraid, even though he should assume that he was competent to give any, that his young friends would listen to it with the impatience with which he as a boy used to hear the wise and weighty advices of the school authorities. (Cheers.) As to encouragement, he would, however, take the opportunity of telling them of the cordial interest which he took in their system of public education generally, and particularly in the institutions of which their school was so creditable a representative. In this country they had an admirable system of public education. The people were never reluctant to submit to sacrifices in order to provide good education to every one in the community. In this they were ahead of those at Home. Here they had in their Collegiate Institutes and High Schools an admirable system of secondary education, and to a certain extent had solved a problem which was far from having been solved in the Mother Country. He was glad to observe that their course of studies made provision for an education of a thorough and varied character, and to notice that a place was found in it for the study of the classics. In this respect their Curriculum, he observed, was arranged in a most sensible manner, giving the student, at a certain point in his school course, the choice between continuing his study of the classics and taking in lieu of them a course of study in modern languages. In giving such an opportunity of choosing between these two courses, they made a wise provision for the various requirements of the community. He was pleased to meet so many of the lady students of Toronto as were present. (Loud Cheers by the boys.) The boys received that sentiment in a manner which showed that they were not afraid of the competition they were likely to encounter from the quick intelligence and ability of the other sex. It had given him much pleasure to learn that on the examination now in progress at University College a number of lady students were at this moment submitting themselves for examination for the degrees of the University. He had an announcement to make which he thought would not be of a depressing character. He had the permission of the trustees to announce that there would be a cessation of work in the school until Tuesday. (Cheers.) He now would bid them good-bye, and hoped they would have a pleasant remembrance of the day when they were introduced to the humble individual who had the honor of bearing Her Majesty's commission at present in this country. (Loud and prolonged cheering.)
