Secrets of Health and Happiness

Prescriptions of Music For Diseases a Real Possibility

By DR. LEONARD KEENE HIRSHBERG,
A. B., M. A., M. D. (Johns Hopkins University).

DR. HIRSHBERG

When Keats sang that "music's golden tongue flattered to tears this aged man and poor," he could scarcely have anticipated the scientific basis of the music which he described as "the power of music on the heart."

Yet that is exactly what has happened. The song of the soldier, the best of the drum and the blast of the bugle cheer, encourage and refresh tired, worn, exhausted troops. So when music pours on sick mortals his magnificent and fills the fighter with the rapid fire of courage, why should not some such instrument as the electrocardiogram and the sphygmomanometer record it?

To discover precisely and in measurable, scientific terms the power of music on the heart and arteries, the "cardiovascular" diseases, Professors I. H. Hyde and William Scapellato, the results of which are announced in the American Journal of Physiology.

Various kinds of music were tried, and the effects were observed and tested upon the heart and blood pressure of individuals, recognized generally among acquaintances for their ability, genius, talent or fondness for music.

An interesting experiment.

To "control" or measure these, comparison of the records was made by having those known to be indifferent to or to dislike music.

Various instruments of the laboratory, such as the sphygmomanometer, electrocardiograph, galvanometers and blood pressure gauge were employed.

The musical numbers selected for the tests were Tchaikovsky's "Symphonie Pathétique"—recognized generally for its somber, slow, tragic motif—the Toreador's song from "Carmen," and the rousing Sousa march, "The National Emblem."

Results Very Plain.

As the subjects listened to the symphony the record proved that there is a slight depression of the pulse blood pressure and no change in the rate. The depth or amplitude of the pulse wave, however, was increased.

After a cessation of the symphony, for from two to ten minutes, it was observed that the blood pressure and the pulse rate were both lower, whereas the rate of the pulse had gone upward. Evidently the minor tones of the "Symphonie Pathétique" produced an exhilaration of the heart beat, but a lowered tension or diminution of the blood pressure.

The Toreador's song, however, yielded the expected contradiction. The pulse wave became smaller, and the pulse rate itself was quickened and accelerated that instant the song ceased. While it was being sung, however, the pulse rate itself was quickened and accelerated that instant the song ceased. While it was being sung, however, the pulse rate itself was quickened and accelerated that instant the song ceased.

The Sousa march number gave the subjects a slower pulse rate, a longer pause between pulse beats and an increase of blood pressure of both the systemic and diastolic—both heart—beats as well as of the pulse pressure. It must be plain to all doubting Thomases that music has power not only of entrancing the senses, but of certain other physiological effects evidenced by such experiments as those of Professors Hyde and Scapellato. Thus, Bluet's stirring song has an impressive, stimulating effect on the adrenal glands, muscles and blood pressure. It is well within the realm of experiment and practice perhaps to be able to select music that could be given in prescription form, each number to fit a corresponding emotional or disease state.

ADELE GARRISON'S NEW REVELATIONS OF A WIFE

Why Madge Was Startled and Amazed By Her Next-Door Neighbor's Servant.

I had little time to speculate upon the meaning of the phrase, "The Capt. Grantland," upon the lips of the "other Mrs. Graham," for, as I turned the corner of the street nearest her home, something more absorbing engrossed my attention.

It is a rare thing for me to look backward over my shoulder when I am walking, and I can only ascribe the fact that I did so at this particular time to one of the psychic little premonitions which come to me sometimes.

As I turned my head suddenly, I saw plodding along not so very far behind me the Japanese servant of the mysterious men who had taken Mrs. Durkee's house next door.

In stereotyped parlance my heart "stood still" at sight of the squat, plodding figure, then gave a bound of recognition. I recalled the surveillance to which my movements had been subjected ever since the new tenants had moved in the queer fashion in the night which I had interpreted as the movement of field glasses held in the hands of men spying upon "our home," remembered also with a little thrill of fear the horseman who had followed me upon the day of my adventure at the inn.

Had they now set their servant to this degrading task? Of espionage? I thought brought a certain fear with it, because of the valuable paper of which was the custodian, and which I believed was the reason of their presence so near my home. That they were members or associates of the gang of enemy spies to which Grace Draper belonged I was fairly sure, principally because I could think of no other possible reason for their spying upon me.

But stronger than fear was the anger that consumed me at the thought of this stolid-looking Asiatic padding along behind me, no doubt keeping me always in sight from beneath his slanting eyelids. I gave another swift glance over my shoulder, still as he was still behind me, and I noted with a little excited tremor that he had perceptibly diminished the distance between us.

What Madge Thought.

Could it be possible that he intended speaking to me? I cast a quick glance around me, saw that the street I was on—a short cross one, connecting the upon which the "other Mrs. Graham" lived with the main thoroughfare of the little village—was almost deserted, with but two or three houses upon it, and those set far back among trees and shrubbery. No one but the Japanese and myself was to be seen, if he planned to speak to me unobserved he could have no better opportunity.

forward. Then with a stroke of a keen-edged knife they cut off the great bunches of bananas. Back of them an army of men gathered the fruit and carried it away.

"Why, they're green!" exclaimed Betty.

"Sure!" laughed Goomerback. "All bananas are pulled green. If the planters waited until they were ripe they'd all spoil before they reached the markets of the outside world."

"Have at bananas, mamma, holding out a lovely banana to her."

"I've asked you three times, dear, if

Betty and Goomerback VISIT A BANANA PLANTATION.

Betty opened her eyes with a merry laugh. She was standing in a strange country at the foot of great, tall plants some of them towering 30 feet above her head.

In the very centre of the crown of a plant nearby Betty spied a beautiful, large, red blossom.

"Where in the world are we, and what are those beautiful flowers?" asked Betty.

"One question at a time," laughed her little friend, Goomerback. "We're in Cuba, and these beautiful red blossoms are the flowers on the banana plants."

Betty had never seen a banana tree. She'd always imagined that bananas grew on low bushes.

"When this land was marked out for a banana plantation an army of men with axes cut down the shrubs, vines and other wild vegetation that grew here," whispered Goomerback.

It was all cleared away, shoots were taken from other full-grown banana trees and planted in rows from 10 to 15 feet apart. The plant is a quick grower and inside of two months the infant shoots grow to the height of about six feet.

"Perhaps this plant is one of them," laughed Betty, pointing to the plant with the beautiful blossom.

"Probably so," continued Goomerback. "And from now on it will send out pretty blossoms, and when they drop off they'll leave behind them a family of baby bananas."

"Here's one!" exclaimed Betty. "Doesn't the flower like the fingers of my hand when it's half closed? When will they be ripe?"

"Well, it takes about twelve months after the blossoming before the bananas are ready to gather," replied Goomerback.

"How in the world do they ever get the bunches down from the tall trees?" asked Betty.

Just then a crowd of laborers came into view, each carrying palm poles with sharp instruments attached to the ends. Reaching up with these, they cut off the leaves so the top of the plant fell you wanted this, but you didn't answer me," laughed her mamma.

"Guess I must have been asleep," laughed Betty, taking the banana. "Dear me, how good it tastes! Do they really pick them when they're green?" she asked.

"Oh, yes, indeed, or else they'd spoil before they reached us," replied her mamma.

Betty munched her banana in silence; she couldn't make up her mind whether she'd dreamed it all or whether she had really stood under the banana trees with Goomerback in far Cuba.
