LUMBERMENS' ATTENTION!

I AM SOLE AGENT FOR THE WOODBRIDGE SAW MILL, which with the late improvements, stands unrivalled.
This Machine requires no expensive puffing, as it has by its own merits become the leading Saw Mill of Canada.
It is so geared that the Saw makes two revolutions to one stroke of the piston, thus avoiding the shaking caused by direct action.

LOVE'S VICTORY.

BY B. L. HARRISON.

Published by Harper Brothers.

SCENE THE THIRD.

AT THE GARDEN PARTY.

CHAPTER VI.

MR. FANGLE FINDS HIMSELF IN A PECU-LIAR POSITION.

"In your thoughts you may not have done so; but then they are at variance with your words and actions.
On the last night we met, Mrs. Fangle and I spoke of you. In confidence, not for the first time. That good woman, who I was led to suppose was your confidante, had some knowledge of the feelings I entertained toward you and in the kindness of her heart, and in perfect sincerity, gave me encouagement. She knew that on that night —which commenced so happily for me, and ended so bitterly—I intended to ask you to become my wife. I came to you, and for a moment was confounded by your changed manner.
Hilberto you had invariably received me with bright looks, and as though my presence were not displeasing to you; suddenly, without any cause or reason that I could discover, you repulsed me, and refused to listen to me. You spoke of Duty, and gave me to understand that it stood in the "way of Love. How—and in what way? Laura, you must deal plainly with me. All the happiness of my life is in your hand. You must not know it. No woman is blind to a man's devotion; few women can fail to discover that that devotion is pure, and free from taint—as mine was. You made me believe that you loved me—"

She held out her hands, as though implored him to spare her, but he went on.

"Every time we met you told me so—not in words, for you never over-stepped the boundary of modesty.
And yet you told me so, and my love was known to you, as yours was believed in and hoped for by me."

He paused here, for he could not but perceive that her emotion was overcoming her. The moon was rising, and the grief on her face was plainly visible to him. He gazed steadily and earnestly at her; but his purpose was fixed, and his heart was so deeply charged with earnestness that he could not rest until he had confined himself to her truth or falsehood. He knew that her truth never had another opportunity of addressing her without reserve.

"You have given me the right to speak, and I must speak. I may never see you more. If what I fear is true, I shall soon bid good-bye to England, leaving my happiness behind me—Let me take away with me the comfort of knowing that you are not like some women I have read of—women who have no regard for truth and honesty, who will play with a man's heart, and plant therein the seed of evil to poison it, and rob it forever of its freshness. Let me at least continue to respect you."

"What would you have me say?" she asked, faintly.

"He answered her with cruel direct-ness. "That you do or do not love me."

The words roused her to strength.
They brought her duty clearly before her. She thought of the man who loved her, and trusted her, and to whom she had given her promise—With soft passion, and yet in a clear tone as Richard had spoken, she asked, for the first time she raised her tearful eyes to his face.

"Knowing what you know, can I in honesty—"

"It may be forgiven him that this appeal to his manliness did not touch him as it should have done. Other passions descended for a time the better, higher feelings of his nature.
"Knowing what I know" he repeated, slowly. "In what way am I to understand that? That you love me and dare not say so; or that you do not love me, and are fearful of confessing it to me?"

Silence was his answer. Had he been aware of the agony she was suffering, of the hard battle she was fighting with her heart, he would have pitied and spared her.

"Then all is over between us," he said in a hard tone, which it pained him as much to use as it did her to hear, "and my life is embittered to the last day. But before I go, there is something to say. It will be the best that nothing shall remain in doubt. You told me that you avoided me for my sake and your own, and for the sake of another you must not name. I will name him. Mr. Armstrong. Answer me in honesty."

"It was I I meant."

"Then what I heard by accident is true. He is your lover. You are engaged to be married to him."

"Once," said Richard gently, after a pause, "when he and I were speaking together, and opening our hearts to each other, he said that love had come to him, and that it had brought into his life his sweetest hope. Knowing him, I know of what kind of love he is capable. He is a true, earnest man! He looked at Richard grave-fully; he planted a dagger in her bosom in return. "Do you love him?"

"Is it generous of you to ask?" she said, appealingly.

"I did not think of it," he replied, bitterly. "I have heard enough, and I will not betray you. Carry your false love to one whose every action bespeaks the nobility of his nature—to one whom any man might be proud to call friend, and who any woman might be proud to win and be loved by, if she loved truly. Farewell!"

She laid her hands upon his arm with gentle firmness. She looked into his face with pitying, pleading eyes.
"Stay," she said; "you have sought me, and have spoken bitter words.
You must not leave me with thoughts in your mind which wrong us both."

He bowed, and stood before her in silence.

"Do not harden your heart to me," she said, sweetly; "listen to me, and pity and respect me. There is something due to me as well as to you.
Ah, you said rightly when you spoke of him to whom I have given my word.
Any man might be proud to call him friend. Any woman loving him might be blessed in his love. But how friend, love, bright and beautiful though it be, is not the most sacred feeling of our nature. Duty is before it. Right-doing is before it. He saved my father from disgrace, from shame, for my sake. He nobly paid the debt which my father believed to be owing, but which we know now was never due—for the wrong was not committed by one of our blood.
Not knowing it was he who had performed this noble act, believing it was my love, I promised to reward with my love the man who had removed the stain from my father's name, and the shame from my father's face. To break that promise, now would break my father's heart; my father, whose life, until the present, has been a life of misery and humiliation. Can I do this? Dare I do this? Should I not rather sacrifice my selfish passion, and strive not to think of the happiness which might have been mine, in the conscience of that I am performing a sacred duty? Aid me in this, as you love me! Assist me in this, as you know me! See my heart! From this moment we must be strangers to each other. As you take away with you the knowledge that she you loved is parted from you by a higher duty than that of love, so give me the consolation of thinking that you approve, in the midst of your own happiness, the duty I am performing. The duty I have undertaken to perform, the duty I never know, striving to do right, peace will come, and I will go to you and my dear, my dear Heaven bless and reward you!"

She held out her hand to him, and he kissed it, with a look of reverence.
Then she turned from him, and sank into a seat, exhausted by emotion. He also turned to go, when Mr. Armstrong's voice arrested his steps.

CHAPTER X.

BROUGHT TO BAY.

Richard had no means of ascertaining from what direction Mr. Armstrong had approached him. He would have escaped if he could, but Mr. Armstrong was too quick for the American might have risen from the ground, so suddenly and silently did he appear upon the scene.

"Where have you been hiding yourself all the evening, Richard?" said Mr. Armstrong. "I have been hunting everywhere for you!"
