for this," he cried hoarsely, "until the day of your death. May He turn all men against you, and make your name a despised and dishonored one forever. You have been false to your duty—false to France. You are a traitor, a contemptible dog of a traitor, and you deserve to die." His whole body shook with passion as he poured the fury of his wrath upon the man before him.

Duvall sank weakly against the packing-case behind him. Suffering, loss of sleep and food, the burning pain in his eyes, his brain threatened to overcome him.

"Let me alone," he gasped. "I am so tired, so very tired." He almost fell as he uttered the words and, indeed, would have done so had Grace not gone quickly up to him and passed her arm lovingly about his shoulders. Turning to Dufrenne, she regarded him with a look of defiance.

"He is not guilty," she cried. "It is I—I who have been false. I made him do it—I made him do it. Go away, and tell the others what you please. I know that my husband has done his best." She fell to soothing him, kissing him upon his hot forehead, his burning cheeks.

Dufrenne looked at Dr. Hartmann, who was regarding the scene before him with impatience.

"Do I understand, monsieur," he asked in a ghastly voice, "that I am free to leave this place?"

"Yes. Out with you. I could hold you for trespass upon my grounds, for attempting to break into my house, but I don't want to be bothered with you. Go!" He went to the door and held it open.

"Mayer," he said, "show this fellow the road. And as for you," he turned to Duvall and his wife, "get away from here, and from Brussels, as soon as you like. I advise you not to stay in the town. I rather think that through the evidence of Seltz I can make it slightly uncomfortable for you. Tell what story you please. I have done you no injury. You came here of your own free will—you could have escaped and you would not. As for the light," he laughed harshly. "An ordinary arc, focused on your eyes with a powerful lens. It would probably have blinded you, in time, and if it kept you awake long enough, you would no doubt have gone mad, but so far you are not hurt much. I can swear that it is part of my treatment for a disordered mental state. My man here will agree with me. What are you going to do about it? How are you going to explain your robbery of Seltz in my office, the deception your wife had practised upon me and upon the United States minister? And above all, now that I have the secret I desire, I am quite willing to have a cast made of the snuff-box and return it to you, but I fancy that neither M. de Grissac nor my friend Lefevre will want to have the matter made public in the courts. You'd better leave here quietly and take the first steamer to America. I don't fancy you'll find a very flattering reception awaiting you in Paris."

He turned to the door. "Come, I'll have your belongings put on a cab, and be glad to be rid of you." He paused beside the doorway, waiting.

Grace turned to her husband. "Come, Richard," she said. "Let us go at once."

He made no reply, but followed her blindly. His spirits seemed broken, he walked like a man in a heavy sleep.

It was just dawn when half an hour later Richard Duvall and his wife drove silently through the ghostly streets of Brussels toward the railway station. The detective did not speak. He sat silent, dolefully, ruminating over the strange events of the last few days.

Richard Duvall, a man of middle age, with a high forehead, a long nose, and a thin mustache, was looking at his watch. He was standing in the middle of the street, looking at his watch. He was standing in the middle of the street, looking at his watch.
