"One Sunday, as with a well-dressed crowd I was going to church I found Fax following me. Knew-ing that he never entered a church. ing that he never entered a church, I took no particular notice of him; but happening te leok back a second time, I saw him at my heels with a twist-loaf in his meuth! He had been in the shop of an irreligious baker in those few minutes. This was too much for my sense of propriety, and as I failed utterly to drive him off, and began to attract considerable attention. I was chiefed considerable attention, I was obliged to go down a side-street and so home. That deg was never absoluted. I have seen him chase chickens into the very houses of their owners, and, before their astonished eyes, pin the poor fewls to the floor. Of course, at such times, I did not wish any-one to think that I was acquainted with the deg. But on being dis-cevered in any disreputable intrusion into house, store, or garden, it was his habit to run to us, and jog along demurely behind us, as much as to say, 'These are the folks I belong to; if you have anything to say, say it to them.' And very often people did say it to us."—From "Dogs of Noted Americans," by Gertrude Van R. Wickham, in Sr. Nic-HOLAS for July.

Recently there was a death in a family in Belfast. One of the daughters went to a dry goods store and wanted to look at a black cashmere shawl, and would take it home for examination. The day after the funeral the shawl was returned to the store by a little girl, who said:
