It was evening. Arthur Roberts and his pretty bride, Belle, had that day taken the vows which had constituted them one. For the first time since that event Arthur found himself alone with his bride for a moment. Prompted by an impulse he could not restrain, he kissed her tenderly, and then as he pressed her to his bosom,

THE FIRST SHADOW.

"Darling, you are my own now, and we will be very happy all our lives; will we not, dear wife ?"

"Oh, I so much hope so," the fond wife answered, bowing her head upon his shoulder, and looking up into his face with an expression of tender love. "But still, Arthur, I almost tremble when I recollect how many of my dearest friends have entered married life with promises almost as bright as mine, only to have them all crushed and trampled into domestic the young man asked. For a moment he seemed suspicious that all was not right with his fair young bride;

all was not right with his fair young bride; but her very attitude was enough to drive away such thoughts from his mind, and he added, a moment later:

"I know you have no fears, Belle; nor have I. 'Tis true there are many unhappy marriages, but we will show all our unfortunate friends how to have peace and happiness in their households."

Belle uttered her assurance that they should be very happy, and then they moved away to rejoin their friends.

"Where is Belle?" he asked, pushing into the little sitting room, where they were accustomed to spend their evenings.

"Deed, sir, I don't know, 'less she's in her own room. The dear woman's not a bit well herself, and she may have dropped asleep."

There was a dissatisfied expression upon the young merchant's face, but he threw open the window, and continued:

"If you please, Mary, you can bring my dressing gown and slippers."

"Obed I will, sir. Where'll I find them?"

The dear woman's not a light movement, and the sleeper awoke.

young, merchant's hearthstone. Arthur was in an ecstasy.

He knew the secret of happy married life, and many a brief lesson did he deliver to his bachelor friends upon this his new favorite theme. But he did not consider that no cause of sorrow or trial had yet come to them.

When the moment arrived, he was to learn that perfect theories might not all ways succeed. In fact, an obstacle which many a less philosophic husband might have made an element of more perfect strength, was to throw a more passing shadow upon their happiness.

It was some distance from his store to his residence, and during the busiest of the season it was seldom he returned till evening, taking a lunch at the nearest restaurant.
