

THE HERO OF HERAT

BY MAUD DIVER

SOME PRESS OPINIONS

THE WORLD

"Mrs. Diver made her mark with 'Captain Desmond, V.C.' In the 'Hero of Herat' she touches a higher plane. We have no hesitation in describing this glorious record of the doings of an actual man, heroic in everything but his name, as a work of remarkable power, and force, and interest.

"It is replete with vivid word-pictures of bygone worthies and unworthies, all told with such wonderful spirit, that of all the dramatis personæ, there is not one who does not live and move and have his being on the printed page.

"'India,' wrote Sir Henry Lawrence, 'fertile in heroes, has never shown, since the days of Clive, a man of greater or of earlier promise than Eldred Pottinger,' and yet how little is known of a man who helped to establish an ideal of British character that remains unshaken to this day. He died untimely, and was too soon forgotten.

"In our opinion it is the finest work of imagination that Mrs. Diver has ever produced, and we recommend it with cordiality."

THE BOOKMAN

"The bare facts are romantic in themselves, and Mrs. Diver, who has studied them closely, marshals them with consummate skill into a narrative that will command the deepest interest of every one in whose heart the voice of duty, raised against the specious pleas of mere self-interest, is capable of awakening a sympathetic chord. Her hero is Eldred Pottinger, scion of a notable Irish family that has given of its best to the Empire.

"The characters of such men as Stoddart, Burnes, Conolly, Keane, Fane, Nott, Cotton, and Macnaghten are limned with a sure and graphic touch; and the attention of the reader is held in thrall throughout."
