Selected Literature.
LOVE'S VICTORY.
BY R. L. FARJON.
Published by Harper Brothers.
SCENE THE FIRST
IN THE BANKING HOUSE.
CHAPTER IX.
FREDERICK CHAPPELL'S LOVE-MARKING.
Mr. Armstrong had a purpose in introducing Laura and Richard to each other at this apparently inopportu-ne time. He saw that Frederick Chappell could scarcely control his passion, and he wished to avoid an open quarrel. The introduction served to divert Richard's and Laura's attention from the young banker—Mr. Armstrong stepped to Frederick's side, and gazed steadily into his face.
"If you have anything to say," said Mr. Armstrong, "it will be as well to speak low, so that they shall not hear."
"I shall please myself as to that," retorted Frederick, but at the same time pitching his voice in a low key.
"By what right do you presume to dictate to me?"
Mr. Armstrong carelessly tapped the pocket in which he had placed Frederick's note, and said, "Keep cool, Mr. Chappell. We have never been friendly, but there is no reason, notwithstanding what has occurred, that we should not continue on the terms we have hitherto maintained.
We will agree to mutually despise each other in a quiet way." A smile accompanied this proposal.
"I may find another way to make you pay for this!"
"Nonsense, nonsense!" said Mr.
Armstrong, with important solemn-ness; "in these days it would be considered brutal to administer to you the rough punishment you deserve.
You know my opinion of your conduct, but I shall not condescend to quarrel with you. Take my advice; I am an older man than you, with a cooler head. Say as little as possible about this affair. If it comes to your ears it will cause unpleasantness in many ways than one. If it occurs to you to make amends by an apology, do so, like a man, and in some part redeem your credit."

But it did not so occur to Frederick Chappell, and after a short pause Mr.
Armstrong continued:
"Understand me clearly. I am desirous that what has taken place in this room shall not be carried to other ears than ours. It is only for the young lady's sake I consent to hush the matter up."
"So that you can play the part of the magnanimous hero in her eyes!" There is no fear of my misunderstanding you. I know now the reason why you were so often behind the scenes. I have interfered with your game, have I? But you are a sly worker."

"Place any construction you please upon my conduct," said Mr. Armstrong, with unflinching temper. "My only anxiety at present is that the young lady's name shall not be made the occasion for light talk. There are only we four, and I will answer for the discretion of Mr. Barton and Mr. Paigle."

His apparent lack of passion in-sulted Frederick. "You will answer for yourself when I call upon you," he cried.
"Certainly I will. But don't call upon me. I am not easily roused, but when roused I am dangerous. There was no possibility of mistaking the meaning of his words; they were uttered with stern earnestness which contrasted powerfully with his previous light manner."

Frederick Chappell laughed scornfully, and approached Laura. As a stranger Richard Barton fell back from her, and Mr. Armstrong also stood a few paces away. Mr. Paigle felt himself in a dilemma; he desired, for prudential reasons, to keep friends with all parties, and he would gladly have given the sovereign he had borrowed from Mr. Armstrong if he could have made a sudden disappearance through the panels without anyone being the wiser. As he could not escape, he was careful to see very little of the awkward scene.

"Be merciful," whispered Frederick to Laura; "castel that only she should hear him; and do not very furthematize me. It was the very madness of my love that caused me to act in a manner so displeasing to you—Say that you forgive me. Take my arm, and let me see you to the door.
That is all I ask."

But she turned her face from him, and refused his offered arm.

During Frederick's last appeal to Laura, another actor appeared upon the scene. Rigby, the old hall-porter of the great firm of Chappell, Chappell, and Chappell—had entered the room unobserved. The cruel blow which had fallen upon the old man in his youth had stamped on his manner certain characteristics which it was too late to hope could ever be effaced. Every movement bespoke the humbleness which springs from the conviction that one is not worthy of respect. When he walked in the street, he walked close to the wall; when he spoke, he never looked into the face of the person whom he addressed. If by inadvertence he raised his eyes, he cast them quickly down, as though he had been guilty of an action which might be reasonably resented. And yet in his youth he had been conspicuous for manliness of character; when, however, the blow fell, and people marked him as the brother of a felon, he accepted his position, and yielded without a murmur. But as he entered the room now there was upon his features the same singular expression of mingled triumph and shame, pride and humiliation, which they had worn when he had solicited an interview with the head of the firm a couple of hours since. It expressed a struggle to lift himself out of the depth into which he had been plunged.

He had expected to find the banker alone in the room, and when he had entered, he had not been prepared to see the figures of Laura and Mr.
Armstrong. Then he stood as if rooted to the spot.

"Come, Laura," said Mr. Armstrong, "we will go." But Frederick was between them. "You seem to forget, Mr. Chappell, that the lady has asked for my escort."

"I am almost old enough to be your father. Come, let us stroll!" Such-like dialogues were not uncommon between them.

With Frederick Chappell, Richard was still, to outward observation, a friendly foe. The scene that had taken place in the banker's room had set the stamp of a cold intimacy upon the relations between the two young men. Each entertained a contempt for the other. But the open expression of Frederick Chappell's sentiments was (as were his feelings towards Mr. Armstrong) restrained and kept in check by his father. Old Mr.
Chappell, although he was much exposed by his special anxieties and ambitions, was not an unobservant man, and he saw clearly that there was a lack of genuine cordiality between his son and the young Australian; and he saw, also, that Richard and Mr. Armstrong were becoming firm friends—a circumstance which was by no means pleasant to him—He spoke to his son on the matter.

You and Mr. Barton do not seem to get along well together."

"And has not," said Frederick, with contemptuous emphasis.

This is a common fiction with many young gentlemen in society—young gentlemen who are looked upon as "swells" in the best sense of the word.
Everyman they do not like is pronounced a "cad," and this definition, in accordance with their code, effectually disposes of him, and establishes his character.

"He is necessarily ignorant," remonstrated Mr. Chappell senior, "of the usages of society. I had hopes that you would be friends. It promised well."

"It isn't my fault," said Frederick;
"I would have put myself out of the way to oblige you, although I don't care for him. And we might have got on fairly enough if we had not been interfered with."

"By whom?"
"Mr. Armstrong. You know my opinion of him."

Mr. Chappell senior frowned.
"They seem to like it better than you have done, Frederick. It is most unfortunate, but it can't be helped, I suppose. But I say my strict injunctions upon you. I will have no quarrelling. This young man is rich, and his connection with the bank may be advantageous. You must behave well to him."

"I will do my best, sir."

Frederick was always properly subservient to his father. He used to tell his acquaintances that he never said a word to make the governor turn red. In this he was wise in his generation, for he depended entirely upon his father, and had the supplies been stopped, even for a short time, it would have been awkward for him.
The young fellow was in constant difficulties about money. Among the misfortunes by which he was afflicted was one which he had managed to keep from his father's knowledge.
He was an inveterate gambler, and not a fortunate one. What gambler is not? Frederick's credit that he was neither of these. A reference to the mildest terms I can think of was made by Mr. Armstrong in a conversation he had with Richard Barton two or three days after the scene in the bank parlor. While Frederick had his father at his elbow, warning him not to quarrel with the young Australian, Richard had a similar friend, in the person of Mr. Armstrong, at his elbow, working to the same end. Richard was for breaking in the most unmistakable manner, with about money. Among the misfortunes by which he was afflicted
