reign Department were there, he would ask him what choice he had of a successful issue in the misery of a reign in which, having commenced with a personal conflict, always to be avoided even by Sovereign under the weight of years; a sovereign was standing in those unparalleled circumstances—positions with one power, while the government was standing with another—a government which had lain for a length of time in a state of torpor, and which, roused from it, was about to rush into more to be avoided than in the case of a Princess who had just stepped upon the throne, and had had no time to confer with Whigs—(cheers)—the kinsmen, the descendants of those who had lived in and loved and with Whigs and Tories, and had been accustomed to the consideration of the two, and to the balance between the two Houses of Parliament, but neither of them had confidence in the noble Lord at the head of the Government, or in the noble Lord who had retired from it, or in any of the Ministers. That was the situation in which they were now placed—(hear, hear)—the situation which the Queen had to consider. Then they should see the Queen and her Ministers, and the Queen would not change two ladies of her bedchamber. They said "let the government stand by the Queen and her Ministers, and the Queen would not change two ladies of her bedchamber." It was not the bedchamber question which was the real question at issue. It was the question whether the Queen should have a Ministry which could stand or not. That was the question which the country had to consider. He would not enter into the question of the bedchamber. He would not enter into the question of the Ministry. He would not enter into the question of the Queen's prerogative. He would not enter into the question of the Queen's conduct. He would not enter into the question of the conduct of the Ministry. He would not enter into the question of the conduct of the noble Lord. He would not enter into the question of the conduct of the Queen
