

Within the interior of the Old Dominion there is a small village, the inhabitants of which are about fifty years behind the age. The principal store of the place was kept by Solomon White, who, by the by, was a great man among the villagers. He was chairman of all public meetings and was looked upon as the possessor of more knowledge than he was in fact aware of himself. However, he knew a great deal—for he was married. His wife was good enough in her own way, but on one point they could never agree; he was a man of very few words—she was a woman whose desire was talking.

One evening, when the shadows of night had stolen over the world, Mrs. White was anxiously awaiting her husband's arrival. Never before had he stayed so late, and, and so her mind was forming reasons for his delay. At last he entered, and without noticing his wife, sat down in a large chair, being on his countenance the marks of dejection.

"You look worn out, Sol," said his better half.

"Yes, I am," he replied in a melancholy tone.

"Come then, eat your supper; you must be hungry."

"Yes, nothing to eat my dear."

"Good gracious! nothing to eat! What has come over the man—are you sick?"

"Beyond the reach of medicine."

"Now do, Sol, take a few of Brandreth's pills to-night and to-morrow you will be well."

"Woman," said Sol, "talk not to me so. Can medicine cure a guilty conscience? Hark! what noise is that? even now, the door is open, and I can see the moonlight, and as the poor fellow spoke he buried his face in his hands, and his frame shook with emotion."

As Mrs. White gazed upon her husband, and noted his actions, the thought intruded that he was taking leave of his senses, and therefore she asked him if he was going mad.

"Mad?" was the reply, "no; would to God that I were. This knowing of remorse will soon make me so, however; wretch that I am."

"Solomon, what on earth is the matter?"

"Ask me not! If I tell you you will fly from me."

"Never! So open your heart and tell me all."

"But you will leave me and who knows but you will be the first to expose my guilt, and so you have committed a crime?"

"I have. What noise is that? alas how conscience makes me a coward."

"Heavens!" exclaimed Mrs. White, becoming alarmed, "and so you think I will permit you to pursue—your wife! Why Solomon, you surprise me."

"Well, my dear, you know your failings—know your weakness of your nature; and remember that what I tell you places my life in your hands. Now, knowing these facts, can you help secret of life and death?"

"So help me Heaven, I can and will."

"I will trust you may be searching for me," said I may whisper it, that not even the air may catch the sound. I am a murderer."

"Murderer!" shrieked Mrs. White, "good God! they will hang you!"

"Yes, if they discover me. But you of course will tell no one. Let not even your looks betray me. You will not tell?"

"No, I will not," did you murder?"

"A poor traveller."

"What could have induced you?"

"He had a pack on his shoulders—ask no more."

"And you killed him?"

"I did the horrid deed."

"And where is the pack for which you have stolen my life?"

"I was disappointed in its contents, and wishing no evidence against me, I buried it with the victim."

"Mons—"

Mrs. White had not time to finish her sentence, for her tongue was palsied by a knock on the door. Solomon trembled like an aspen leaf, while he muttered—"Officers, but; mustering up his courage, he opened the door.

It proved to be only a neighbor, who soon took her departure, and said Mrs. White turned to her husband and whispered—

"I have killed the peddler, you have killed."

"I can tell you no more," was the reply. Already I have told you too much. Come let us retire; my mind needs repose; and as he spoke he made preparations to retire.

The day after was a most lovely one; but to the dear of Mrs. White all was dark. As she tried to go to bed, her conscience was dejected, and her members were those of a person laboring under a high state of excitement. The terrible secret pressed upon her; she must have a confidant, or die. To stay in the house was misery; so, after breakfast she called upon a particular friend and thus began:

"I cannot sleep a wink last night."

"Indeed," replied Mrs. Smith, "what was the matter? No ill?"

"Not exactly; but to tell the truth, I think I'm going mad."

"Lord of mercy! Mrs. White, how you do talk!"

But she alarmed my dear Mrs. S.—then a knock on the door. But such sad things have happened, and I can't tell a living soul."

"Well, you can tell best."

"Horrible," said Mrs. White—"horrible!"

"Gracious no! you don't say so."

"I can't breathe it—the very air would betray me."

"Mrs. White, you know that I am your friend—your trustworthiest friend—and a secret with me is sacred—you can use your own judgment, however."

"Oh, it's too terrible!"

"I pity you my friend."

"I believe you, but if I tell you, you must not breathe a word."

"Mrs. White, I am surprised at you; I am no retailer of news—I hate gossip."

"Well I will trust you, and perhaps you can advise me."

"I will, with pleasure."

"Well listen; my husband has committed a murder!"

"Heavens!" ejaculated Mrs. Smith; and her eyes were raised with horror.

"A murder? who has he murdered?"

"My suspicions tell me it is Jones the peddler."

"What could have been the inducement?"

"I don't know, but it was not his pack, for he buried that with him. My friend how am I to set?"

"What! me advise you! how should I? None of my family ever murdered."

"Wretched, wretched woman that I am!"

"Ah, my dear Mrs. White—"

But here the entrance of Mr. Gossp put an end to the conversation, and Mrs. White ran to the room.

"Would you believe it?" said Mrs. Smith, during a pause in which Mrs. Gossp was striving to regain her breath—"would you believe that Mr. White is a murderer?"

"Merciful Heavens! Impossible!"

"It is shocking, but true!"

"Here are my mind my dear Mrs. Smith and tell me the particulars."

"But it is a secret—a great secret."

"With me it will be no secret. I'll never mention it."

"Well, then, Mr. White has murdered poor Jones the peddler."

"Horrible! Poor Mrs. White."

"Terrible! Shocking!"

As a blow of an avalanche over the plains she was struck by the news of the murder; and she heard the construction of the deed.

And she heard the news. The could hardly be convinced." But yet the information was so current, and from such undoubted authority, that they were compelled to credit it. Mrs. Gainsworth had it from Mrs. Brown; and was told confidentially by her that she had heard from Mrs. White was made aware of the fact that Mrs. Slender heard Mrs. Truogency say with her own lips, that Mrs. Wise was present at the time that Mrs. Gainsp enjoined secrecy on all, so she related the fact, that Mrs. Smith told her that she had it from Mrs. White herself; with such an array of testimony, there was no business to doubt.

One week had passed and nothing had been heard of the missing peddler. His friends used uncensured endeavors to find out his whereabouts, but all in vain. Ramor had carried the news to the officers of justice, but so high was White's character held that it was not until the peddler could not be found, that they apprehended the murderer.

One morning as White was pouring over the pages of his newspaper, he was interrupted by the entrance of two officers who came to take him into custody.

"Very sorry, Mr. White," said one, "but can't help it."

"Lead for you Sol," said No. 2, "but must do so."

"Why am I thus insulted?"

"Come along, you know well enough."

On arriving at the Squire's office, he was charged with the murder of one Thomas Jones, the peddler.

Solomon White smiled a peculiar smile as he heard the grave charge, but when he was told that Jones had in reality disappeared after he had made his appearance in the office, he smiled no more.

"Squire Clark said he is innocent. I merely wished to see if my wife could keep a secret."

"Mr. White, that story won't go down. We are too wide awake. Now sir, we will ask you a few questions."

"Did you kill anybody—or not?"

"I did."

"Mr. White, we don't want you to criminalize yourself, but you admit that you did kill one body."

"It was not Tom Jones, though."

"We will come to that point after a while, now, who was it?"

"Well, Mr. Justice, said White, in a sarcastic tone, "did I have evidence of your own words you are wide awake, so perhaps you can save me the trouble of informing you. Do so and you shall see the grave of my victim."

"None of your insolence—you presume too much on your former character. We shall find out all ourselves."

"Well, do so."

"Time, Mr. White is required for all things. We will now give you in charge of the officers and see where you will lead them. It was an imposing spectacle; with that self-same self-possession Solomon took the lead, and the officers kept by his side. Behind them came a motley crew of all kinds, sizes, and complexion, which curiosity had led to follow. After taking them about a mile he stopped before a tree, at the bottom of which was a large stone.

"Here gentlemen," said he, "is the spot where the deed was done, and beneath this stone is his body."

By the combined efforts of the two officers the stone was removed, and as they and the eager crowd rushed in to see the murdered man, they beheld—not Tom Jones, but a human form, in whose skull was his pack!

Astonishment kept them silent for a moment, but recovering their senses, they cried:

"And this is all? Is this the murdered man?"

"Well I think it is," checked White, "you see, I have struck me that a woman could not keep a secret, even if her husband's life depended upon it—you see the result. Ha, ha, ha!"

"Ha, ha, ha!" yelled out one.

"A glorious joke," all chimed in.

A capital joke it was to everybody, and when Tom Jones made his appearance, none enjoyed it more.

Poor Mrs. White, when she was informed of the case, declared it was a plot to ruin her character—that Solomon White and Tom Jones, were brutes so to deceive her. But a day or two of calm meditation taught her a useful lesson and whenever she felt inclined to tell a falsehood secret aloud she would pause and she thought of the "Murdered Traveller."
