

sities in most countries of the Old World, but which would be sufficient to maintain them with ease, and in comparative affluence, in British North America. To descant upon this branch of the subject with the fullness which it deserves, would swell this small work considerably beyond its limits as originally contemplated ; and it will, therefore, not be attempted at all.

THE END.