

Is the Fate of the Zeppelin a Portent?

Can We See in It a Symbol of Germany Herself in the Last Stage of Defeat, Frightfulness?

"From accounts there was something sublime, like the fall of Lucifer, in the fate of the Zeppelin which attacked London on Saturday night," says the Morning Post.

"This unlucky unit in a fleet of thirteen went flaming headlong through the etheral sky in 'hideous ruin and combustion.' For one great moment it up the night and then shrank to a bar of fiery red, which descended slowly to earth with its broiling crew."

"While it would be an affectation to mourn over the fate of people who were trying to drop high-explosive bombs down our chimneys, mere humanity might perhaps suggest that the War Lord should not think it necessary to make any more such burnt offerings to the good old German God. But if the Germans desire to turn any more of their people into incandescent burners, let them go on sending their Zeppelins, and we shall go on doing our humble best to bring them down."

"Certainly the loss of their airships is better calculated to touch the German heart than the loss of our babies, and it is a comfortable reflection that the skill of our gunners and the daring of our airmen are developing an argument which the Germans will respect. There is no better way of discouraging such attacks than making it hot for the attacker, and we may be certain that the encouragement of success will help our islanders to give an even warmer welcome to the visitants."

Tracked by Searchlights.
The sight of the falling, blazing Zeppelin was amazing, and was seen by thousands of people within a radius of 20 miles from Cuffley, where it fell in a lonely field, over 13 safe miles from the heart of London. Some soldiers saw the great sight from the big stand at Lord's cricket ground.

One of the best descriptions of the last 20 minutes of the career of the Zeppelin is given by a correspondent of the Morning Post.

"About half-past-eleven the searchlights began their work. No quarter of the sky from which an aerial raider could possibly, under the existing conditions, hope to approach the London area was left unexplored or was not swept again and again with a wonderful trellis-work of subdued but penetrative beams. Gradually one group of lights was concentrated on a particular area of the sky, at first in an irregular and broken circle, but, as the circle narrowed, the gaps between the lights were filled. The circle remained almost stationary, but other lights flashed round about it incessantly."

"There She Is."
"Steadily round the edges of one large cloudbank the circle rested. If there were any Zeppelins behind it, its only hope of remaining undetected

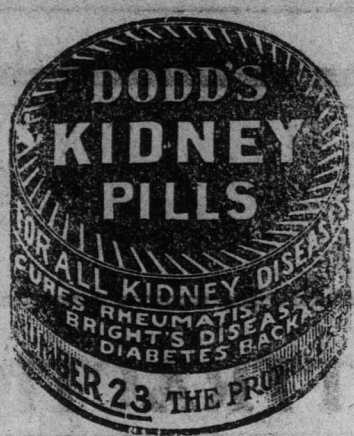

"We watched, fascinated, the terrible death of the Zeppelin. The blazing airship swung round for an instant, broadside on, as though unmanageable; then the burning end dipped, the flames ran up the whole structure as her petrol tanks one after another caught fire. In another second or two the Zeppelin, now perpendicular, was falling headlong to earth from a height not much short of a couple of miles, a mass of roaring flame. So tremendous was the blaze and so intense the light that she seemed to be an immense incandescent mantle at white heat and enveloped in flame, falling, and illuminating the country for miles round."

"In her descent there was a series of explosions, due, perhaps, to her petrol tanks blowing up. With ever-increasing momentum she sped down until at last she struck the earth with a crash that could be heard for miles. A dull red glow brightened the heavens for a few seconds, and a distant mass of still burning wreckage was all that was left of the Zeppelin. The people watched the attack on the Zeppelin in silence, but when she was seen to be on fire cheer upon cheer was raised and repeated again and again. From first to last the Zeppelin was in sight about twenty minutes."

The Blast.
"We were standing by the smoking, evil-smelling ruins of the smashed and obliterated Zeppelin—a strange, nightmare sight in such pastoral and sublimely peaceful surroundings," says the Mail.

"Dead men, burnt and battered beyond human semblance, lay around in weird attitudes. They were German dead, but the picture of them as they lay there among the unspeakable wreckage, swathed and bronzed like mummies ravished from some ancient tomb, was sufficiently poignant to strike a note of pity in the heart—pity, though they were Germans."

"Till their burial this human wreckage found a quiet sanctuary in a little English church near by. Sunday was a day of rejoicing for was to stay and drift with it. Suddenly the cloud parted, and through the gap and at a great height the gleaming outline of the Zeppelin was discerned. The cry of "There she is" was followed by the boom of a gun, and an instant later a shell burst in what appeared to be close proximity to the raider.

"Then every gun within range spoke, and the din created by the rapid discharges, the scream of the shells, and the noise of the explosions was something to be remembered. The people roused from their beds for the most part, flocked into the streets to see the spectacle. The revelation of the extensive measures taken for the protection of Outer London must have been as great a surprise to the people themselves as to the raiders, for alike in gunfire and searchlights the experiences of previous raids were far surpassed."

Efforts to Escape.
"Evidently the Zeppelin found it too warm to be pleasant. It was then heading due west, but swung round to the north-west, and lost no time in rising to a still higher altitude. But the inextinguishable circle of light rose too, and the Zeppelin was more clearly outlined than ever, the firing, if anything, increasing in intensity. Then it appeared to rift almost broadside to the wind in an easterly direction, and, after being nearly stationary for a few seconds, turned rapidly towards almost every point of the compass, as though seeking some way out from the terrible circle of light which surrounded it. Try as it would it could not escape; the outer darkness, so appropriate to its mission, was unattainable."

"Then it seemed as though it was coming lower, and it approached so closely the high ground where others and I were standing that it was possible in the strong glare of the searchlights to detect the gondolas beneath the great body and to discern faintly the outlines of its frame. Then the Zeppelin turned its head towards the east, and rising quickly as it gained speed, changed its course again and fled to the northeast. But the surrounding circle of light went with it. "Suddenly flames broke out from, apparently, one of the gondolas, and an instant later one end of the body of the Zeppelin was seen to be on fire. For a few moments the doomed airship hovered and turned."

The Blazing Airship Falls.
"We watched, fascinated, the terrible death of the Zeppelin. The blazing airship swung round for an instant, broadside on, as though unmanageable; then the burning end dipped, the flames ran up the whole structure as her petrol tanks one after another caught fire. In another second or two the Zeppelin, now perpendicular, was falling headlong to earth from a height not much short of a couple of miles, a mass of roaring flame. Your Boys and Girls.

In the child who responds quickly in obedience is seen one already on the path to trained and instant obedience, without servility, simply showing the recognition of simple directions, a valuable point in the education of children. In another a carelessness habit of mind is noted, a lax recognition of the mother's authority, which should be recognized in every way.

There are three ways that mothers govern children—first by maneuvering and artifice; second—by reason and affection; and third by authority. Of the three methods the last is the only one which can be followed either with comfort to the parent or safety to the child, and this method can be brought effectually into operation by gentle measures. It is indeed true that the importance of tact and skill in the training of the young, of cultivating their reason and securing their affection cannot be overrated, but the influences secured by these means form at best but a sandy foundation, without gentle but firm authority.

FRENCHMAN COMING.—The French steamer Pro Patria is supposed to be now on her way here from Sydney with a general cargo, consigned to Tessier & Co. At the latter part of this week she will be engaged by the Reid Company to run between this port and North Sydney. She will make a couple of trips, thereby obviating any freight congestion likely to occur at North Sydney this fall.
