

THE SHOES I CAN'T WEAR

All Because of a "Touchy" CORN

BUT you can wear them, Madam—and now. Simply place on that corn a little Blue-jay plaster, and never again will you feel it. In two days there will be no corn. It will disappear for good. Millions of women know that. They don't pare corns. They don't use old-time methods. And they don't suffer. When a corn appears they end it. We are urging you to join them. Corns are needless since Blue-jay was invented. So they are absurd. You can prove in one minute that Blue-jay stops corn aches. You can prove in two days that it ends them forever.

CHAPTER V. A Trespasser.

"If your ladyship were not in deep mourning, a lavender sash would be a great improvement," she suggested.

Norah nodded, and took up the hair brushes forgetfully, but was reminded of her "fine lady" condition by Harman gently and respectfully taking them out of her hand.

"I can brush it so much better, my lady," she murmured apologetically.

"Yes, that I am sure you can," assented Norah, sinking into the comfortable chair and resigning herself. "I'm afraid I confuse you terribly, but I am accustomed to doing everything for myself; but I shall get used to it, I dare say."

"Oh, yes, my lady."

Norah was silent for a minute or two, marveling at the ease and skill with which the maid brushed the long thick hair without inflicting the least pain or inconvenience. Then, still thinking of her last night's adventure, she said:

"Who sleeps in this part of the house?"

"No one usually but your ladyship. Mr. Petherick slept in this wing last night, and my room is next your suite."

"There was no one, no gentleman, I mean, sleeping in the house excepting my father"—she hesitated a little at the novel word—"and Mr. Petherick?"

"No, my lady," replied Harman, with a faint expression of surprise in her face, which Norah saw in the glass. "We have very few visitors. Mr. Guildford Berton used to come and stay, but he has got a cottage in the village, just outside the gates."

"Is Guildford his only Christian name?" asked Norah, thinking that possibly he might have been the "Jack" the unknown had called to.

"Yes, my lady, I think so. I never heard of his having any other."

Then it would seem that the two men were absolute strangers! It was strange and mysterious! Harman wound the beautiful plaits of hair in a thick coil at the back of the shapely head, and finished dressing her misery visitor, and he opened and read his letters with leisurely grace.

Norah was hungry after her sound night's rest and cold bath, and ate a good breakfast, looking round the handsomely-furnished room as she did so, and occasionally allowing her glance to rest upon the aristocratic face opposite her as it bent serenely over the letters and papers.

Presently, having finished with them, the earl laid them methodically in a pile, and looked across at her.

"I fear you will find it dull here at the court, Norah. I regret that I cannot go up to the house in town, but London does not agree with me, and I rarely remain there longer than a few days."

"I shall not be dull here," she said; "it is all so new and strange to me, and I do not wish to go to London."

"Of course you will have to go to be presented," he remarked; "but perhaps Lady Ferndale will be kind enough to chaperon you. Do you play?"

"Yes," replied Norah. "I have worked very hard at my music." He inclined his head.

"There is a piano in the drawing-room—a grand of Erard's—and one in your own room. I trust everything was to your taste in your apartments," he added.

"Yes, indeed," said Norah, warmly; "everything is so beautiful. I was admiring the pretty furniture and things before I went to sleep last night."

He bowed slightly.

"I hope that if there should be anything you desire you will at once express your wish; it shall be gratified. I will see that you have a suitable horse, and that some one be found to teach you to ride. I fear that I shall be but a poor companion for you, and that you will feel lonely at times."

"I am used to being alone a great deal," said Norah, softly. "I have often spent days without speaking to any one excepting Catherine."

"Catherine? Ah, yes, pardon me, I had forgotten. Catherine Hayes, your maid."

"And I am sure I shall be quite happy wandering about this beautiful place when it is fine, and on wet days there will be books and music."

"I am obliged to you for taking so cheerful a view of the prospect," he said. "I regret that the state of my health will not often permit me to accompany you, and I have also a heavy correspondence, as you see, and I have waved his hand to the letters. "Although I have long since ceased to take an active part in politics, my former colleagues pay me the frequent compliment of consulting me."

"Perhaps I could help you," said Norah, with a mixture of timidity and eagerness. "I—I write a plain hand for a woman, and I used to write all mamma's letters—" She stopped, warned by the sudden frown which darkened the earl's face that she had trodden on forbidden ground.

"Thank you very much," he said, dryly, and with icy courtesy, "but I could not dream of troubling you."

"It would be no trouble, but a pleasure," said Norah in a low voice. He declined the offer with a stately gesture, and gathered his letters together.

"Perhaps you would like to drive this morning?" he said. "The weather is particularly fine. If so, pray order the carriage. The groom of the stables will be in attendance to receive your commands whenever you send for him. And now I will ask you to excuse me," and he rose and left the room.

Norah sat for a few minutes thinking over all that he had said, with an aching pain at her heart.

It was evident that if her father, the earl, did not actually dislike her, he did not entertain the slightest affection for her, and that he intended to keep her at arm's length.

It had been lonely at Cliff Cottage since her mother died, but she had had some one to love there in the faithful and devoted Catherine; but here at Santleigh Court there was no one on whom her gentle heart could lavish its wealth of love, no one who cared for her, and she felt at the moment that she would exchange all the wealth and grandeur which had so strangely become hers for any condition, however lowly, in which there should be some one to love and love her in return.

She went to the window and looked out, and for a moment she thought that she would go for a drive as the earl had suggested, but she shrank from the elaborate business of summoning the groom of the stables, and decided to go for a walk instead.

As she was passing through the hall on the way to her room to get her hat, a footman informed her that his lordship would be greatly obliged if she would go to him in the library, and opened the door for her.

The earl was seated at his writing-table, and rose as she entered, and stood expectantly.

"I am sorry to trouble you, Norah," he said, "but I forgot to mention a matter at breakfast. You will need—"

"Oh, but I have some," said Norah, quickly.

His eyebrows went up at the interruption.

"A small sum, no doubt," he said, "but scarcely sufficient for your purposes. I have opened an account for you at the bank at Lichester, the town three miles distant, and here is your check book."

Norah took it and looked at it rather bewildered.

"I don't know what to do with it," she said, with a smile. "I never had a check book before, papa."

The earl smiled.

"Permit me to show you," he said.

"You have but to fill in the amount in writing here and the figures here, and the date at the top, and sign your name, and the bank—or, indeed, any one else—will pay you the sum stated on the check. That is, if you do not draw more than a couple of hundred pounds, which is the sum I shall pay in to your account at midsummer and Christmas."

"Two hundred pounds—four hundred pounds a year!" exclaimed Norah, laughing and flushing. "Why, I shall not know what to do with so much money."

He smiled coldly.

"Doubtless you will find it go quickly enough. Dresses and—female apparel generally—are expensive, I believe. I place this money at your absolute disposal, and you will understand, of course, that, as I am ignorant of all such matters, you will procure your own wardrobe. If the sum is not sufficient, pray let me know, and I will increase it."

He had managed to destroy all the pleasure Norah had felt in the gift, and her smile vanished as he bowed her out, for she understood that he intended to imply that he had disclaimed all concern or interest in her clothes.

With the check book in her hand, Norah went up to her own room, where Harman was stitching fresh lace on Norah's best dress.

"I came for my hat," said Norah, looking round for it.

BRITISH MINE SWEEPER ONLY TWELVE SURVIVED

LONDON, Oct. 26.—A statement given out by the Admiralty says that one of our sweepers, the Genista, Lieut.-Comdr. White, R.N., was torpedoed by a German submarine on Oct. 23 and all the officers and 73 men were killed when the ship was sinking, but was saved with the submarine.

GERMAN ATTACKS PARIS

PARIS, Oct. 26.—The Germans made four successive violent attacks on the Verdun front against Douaumont positions, but all failed, according to a statement by the war office to-night. The number of prisoners to date is over 100,000.

IN MACEDONIA

PARIS, Oct. 26.—North of the Starokvrag mountains Serbian troops, charged by the Bulgarian forces and seized a height at the confluence of the Tisza and Strojnitza rivers to the south of Monastir. A hundred and thirty prisoners remained in the hands of the Allies. Southwest of Lake Ohrid our cavalry, supported by two units, on Tuesday occupied the bridges and the villages of Gostivar and Laistava.

French cavalry on the Macedonian front, supported by infantry, occupied two villages southwest of Lake Ohrid yesterday, the war office announced today. The Serbians threw back the German and Bulgarian forces of the region of Cernavoda.

SERBIAN REPORT

SALONIKA, Oct. 26.—The following report was given today at the Serbian army headquarters: On Oct. 24 our Danubian Drina divisions captured heights on the left bank of the River, flowing into the mouth of the Strojnitza torrent. We took 400 prisoners and deserters and captured a machine gun ready for action.

THE U-53

LONDON, Oct. 26.—The activities of the German U-53 near the American coast and the general question of the relations of the United States with submarine warfare matters, will be considered at the American and German conferences, said Foreign Secretary Balfour to the Lords to-day. He deprecated discussion on these questions and decided for the American Government to decide on the policy of action to be taken by the circumstances of the case. Lord Balfour said that the activities of the American ships did not appear quite within the bounds of neutrality and that he thought the British Government to take notice of this fact. Lord Balfour expressed the opinion that Germany intended to bring the war to the sea as to be able to do so she could not fight the whole world, also because the States would be a valuable asset to her at a peace conference.

The submarine question was brought forward by Lord Balfour.
