The Braes of Yarrow

An Historical Tale of the Sixteenth Century.

The whole force of the Castle was now occupied in keeping the populace at bay. The citizens, knowing that a pardon had arrived, and having seen the man fall were eager to learn his fate; and the haste of the Governor promised to bring about the riots he had hoped by haste in completing the work to avoid. The verdict of the physician, however, was made known and quickly spread amongst the crowd. The intelligence appeased the citizens, and soon after they began leisurely to disperse. Bit during the whole afternoon there were many groups about the Luckenboots, and about High Street and the Grassmarket busy discussing the event of the day.

Grassmarker busy discussing the event of the day.

Master Elliot wholly unconscious of the happy turn affairs had taken, was conveyed to a chamber above the old Portcullis Gate.

He was laid upon a couch, undressed, and then the surgeon succeeded in extracting the bullet. Captain Lindsay was present during the operation; and as soon as it was finished he resumed his abrupt stern manner, being assured now that the patient was certain to recover.

The prediction was verified. At the time he received the wound Gilbert's blood was thin from previous illness, and this condition secured him from fever. In a week he was able to sit up in bed and talk with Captain Lindsay, who acquainted him with the occurrences after he had fallen.

But who were the friends whose solicitation obtained this act of clemency? queried Gilbert puzzled.

The Captain smiled grimly and did not answer.

"You were one of them?' proceeded the invalid"

"Right."

"But who were the others?'

"Can you not think of any one who may have the ear of her Majesty and who is interested in you?"

"Not one—and as soon as the words were out he crimsoned and corrected himself—"Yes there is one."

"Well one true friend with opportunity at command can do much to help a friend out of a difficulty. I can say no more."

"Well one true friend with opportunity at command can do much to help a friend out of a difficulty. I can say no more."

He had said enough, however, to convince Gilbert that pretty Mistress Douglas was the friend to whom he owed the pardon.

In another week he was able to rise from his couch and to sit for several hours by the window looking down the Castle hill, watching the Esplanade and the promensding citivesited by the Captain.

"I have good tidings for you, Master Elliot," he sald in his abrupt way; your appointment to the Queen's Guard has been renewed."

Gilbert's pale face glowed with pleasure, and with gratitude to her Majesty.

"I will live, I trust, to show our gracious Mistress that I am a loyal servant."

Not a word beyond this would Andrew de-clare. That was his message and he 'wasna at liberty to say mair.'
