

The Foster Brother; OR— The Orphan of the Wreck.

CHAPTER XIII. FURTHER REVELATIONS—A MARRIAGE-DAY FIXED—THE EVENTS OF EIGHTEEN YEARS. "Whatever the paper may have to tell us," he said, "I am your brother and you are my sister, in the holiest, the tenderest, the realest sense."

"I hope, dear George, you will not be too greatly moved by the knowledge that your parentage is unknown. You have, I think, a strength of mind which will prevent you from being unduly affected by the discovery. It is natural, however, that it should arouse strong and peculiar feelings in your bosom, and even the desire to discover who your real parents were."

"This, my dear George, is all that I have to tell relating to your infancy. But by this time you and Caroline must wonder why my true name has never been made known to you—why I passed from the name of Bruce to Eglantine, and left you both to bear that appellation. It is a sad and painful story, my children, and gladly would I pass from life into the oblivion into which sorrow and adversity brought us."

"You can remember little of my dear dead wife—of Caroline's sainted mother. She died when you were too young to know your irreparable loss and mine. To me her death was an overwhelming blow. I fear the seeds of the disease which carried her off two years after the shipwreck were sown in her frame on that terrible night of storm and exposure. From that time she drooped and faded, and at length she died; and I may truly say that my life went out with hers—my hope, my courage, my professional aspirations were buried in her grave—and though I might for your sakes have followed out my profession as an artist, a shock of paralysis came and made me the poor helpless object which you have always known me to be."
