"No, my servant will bring it round."
"All right. Now, have you any directions to give before you go?"
"No more," said Billy. "I'm ready."
He looked round the room as he spoke. It had known his bofisterous spirits and his heavy pain. Her laughter had echoed round its blue walls. There was her music book—he had been having lessons from her and there the chair that had been her favorite. How often she had stood beside the paine and had sung to his own exerciable accompaniment! The music had not been of a very high class, but what mattered that! How she had teased and petted him! How glorious she had looked sometimes in her large beauty! I here was semething lying on her chair. It was a pair of her gloves. He went over and put them into his pocket. There were tears in his eyes when he followed Rutherford from the room.

CHAPTER XXI.

BILLY IN KNIGHTSBRIDGE.
Once at home in his own rooms Rutherford began to see that he shad undertaken no light task. Billy was in low spirits, and it was with difficulty that his constant and it was with difficulty was not been equaled for years, an increasing the was not been equaled for years, an increasing the was not been equaled for years, an increasing the was not been equaled for years, an increasing the was not been equaled for years, an increasing the was not been equaled for years, and increasing the was not been equaled for years, and increasing the was not been equaled for out of the despondency into which he had younk.

Later in the evening Rutherford's own spirits rose. Something that Billy told him threw a still stronger light upon the attitude of Mrs. Hartley with regard to nimself, and he was strengthened in the belief that he was not wrong in attributing to her the anonymous letter. So certain did he become of this that he did not even deem it necessary to mention the object of his visit that afternoon to Barn street. The letter itself had grown small, trifling, futile. Poor Billy could not for long keep off the subject of his own misery, and he returned to it as soon as the servant left the room. He looked so unhappy that Rutherford was quite concerned about him.

"I'm wretched bad company, old chap," said Billy after a silence, during which Johnson put the wine in front of his master and withdrew; "but you knew that when you asked me, didn't you! I am perfectly miserable when I think of her, and that is all the time. I oughtn't to inflict my troubles on you, but just now I can't heln it."

help it."
"My dear Billy, I am only too glad to have you here. If I could do anything to comfort you I would. I know how black comfort you I would. I know how black things appear now; I scarcely know what to say to you."

Hartley looked at him gratefully.
"Who?"

things appear now; I scarcely know what to say to you."

Hartley looked at him gratefully.

"Who!"

"Jackey. I'm incoherent. I can't help it. I can't think clearly now. Yes—Jackey. I could not make her out about you. You know that night you had supper with as. After you'd gone she sat on talking about you for nearly one hour. I don't know what you can have said to her. First of all she said she hated you, and then she took to praising your looks—said a lot about you, envied the woman who would marry you, talked about your face and your hair, and said you had a devil of a strong will. And then she asked a lot about you—where you lived, and all that, and then she took up that photograph you asked me for to-day, and she began to talk to it in a sort of way—called it beautiful, and then sickening, insipid like wine and water. She couldn't think what men could see in an innocent face like that, and then she kissed it and flung it across the room."

"Did she say all that?"

"And a lot more," said Billy.
Rutherford could have laughed aloud. What need now to worry himself about the letter? What doubt but that in wanton anger she had written it?

"What had you bin sayin' to her?" asked Billy.

"She was ungry with me because I did not believe that Miss Wilton was her cousis."

"Wasn't sheiner cousin?"

Wouldn't gancy you'd know.

some of the miners working in the "upper levels," but did them no damage, not even shaking down loose rocks and earth. The station men in the various shafts felt it strongest, and the deepest pointwhere it was noticed was by the ninth station man, who was on watch at the 200-foot level. He said it felt like a faint throb or pulsation of air, as though a blast had been fired above, below, or in some indefinite direction. In some of the Virginia City mines the shock was not felt at all, not even by station men in the shafts.

Why Does the Sun Continue to Burn'

Why Does the Sun Continue to Burn?
Thousands of curious and ingenious theories have been brought forth to account for the fact that the sun, although he has whirled his burning disc across the heavens for untold ages, continues to burn without being consumed or his bulk being lessened in the least. Some learned men affect to believe that the great orb is a monstrous bail of gas, but even a great ball of gas would be consumed in its ut most atom in the course of a few thousand years. Others pretend to believe that its fires are kept up by the remains of wrecked worlds, which are constantly falling into its depths, but even this seems far from probable, not to say a purely absurd conclusion. In giving, his opinion on the last contention, one of the most eminent astronomers of the day has figured that a mountain range consisting of 176 cubic miles falling into the sun would only be sufficient to maintain the present heat for a single second; a mass equal to that of our earth would engender only enough of heat to last 93 years.

the clothing was let to the Cowie Brothers. In order to expedite matters Ned Cowie sent the following telegram to all the agents along the line:

"Be on the platform when Ne. 19 passes, with nothing on but your pants and shirt."

Cowie was thus enabled to measure the candidates in short order and pass on. When 19 pulled into Banning Cowie jumped off, looked around and said: "Well, where's the agent?" A stalwart youth, who happened to be Miss Fake's brother, stepped up and asked if he was the man who sent the agent a telegram. Cowie answered in the affirmative, and the fellow started to climb him. It took an hour to explain matters to young Fake, but everybody laughed so over the story that the company decided to let its country agents continue to wear overalls.
