

Fairchild states that the Oberlin had peculiar and special advantages for the success (?) of co-education, and also expresses a doubt as to the wisdom of introducing this scheme after a separate scheme has been in operation for some time.

As for Dr. Grant, he is by no means a pronounced co-educator, but rather a decided advocate of separate education where such can be obtained, as shewn by his energy in founding a Ladies' Medical College.

We know Mr. S. refers to the evidence he gave a few months ago in the 'VARSITY when he speaks of the 'overwhelming array,' but cut away the names of Drs. White and Fairchild and a few others, and co-educationists, talk and write as they will, must 'go west' to small minor institutions to make up their evidence.

Let me ask, in conclusion, why Mr. S. speaks so unbecomingly of Drs. Wilson and Eliot? If they have tried separate education as Dr. White and Fairchild have tried co-education, surely the opinions of the former ought to have, at least, equal weight with the opinions of the latter in comparing the two systems of education.

Yours, &c.,
JNO. MCGILLIVRAY.
