Sir Thomas Shaughnessy and J. W. Leonard, with other members of the executive, conceived the Toronto-to-Sudbury line, and in a thoroly business spirit. No subsidy was asked for and none was given. It is one of the few lines in Canada, if, indeed, there are any others, built without some form of governmental or municipal assistance. The board of directors authorized the line with the approval of the shareholders, and the engineering corps planned the line. It was to be built with the lowest grades and easiest curves, regardless of expense.
