RELIGION AS A HUMAN FORCE

Question of Faith is the Whole
Cause of the Opposition to Home Rule For Ireland.

By W. B. Thompson.

LONDON, July 5.—Lord Haldane's philosophical address last week on the part played by religion in the world's affairs has been followed this week by Ulster's rhetorical parade against home rule.

The two subjects are closely akin, for the lord chancellor's dictum that religion was the greatest moving force in the world, put merely another aspect of the great truth that there is a good and bad side to every human institution. The bad side of religion as a human force is well illustrated by the case of Ulster.

The old arguments against home rule have been abandoned one by one. The idea that it involved separation is demonstrated to be false, for every self-governing part of the British empire is stronger in favor of home rule. The old taunt that the Irish people were incapable of self-government has been belied by actual experience, for they have made better use of their powers in local self-government than the English people have. The only argument left to the Unionists in their opposition to home rule is based upon the anti-Catholic prejudice—for that is what the Ulster question resolves itself into. Let the democrat ponder over the significance of this fact.

Frankly, and without shame, the Tory party in England (which embraces such leading Catholics as the Duke of Norfolk), resist home rule solely on the ground that the Protestant extremists in Ulster hate the idea of being put on a footing of equality with the Roman Catholics of Ireland. The more honest and high-minded people in the "Unionist" party feel ashamed of the religious bigotry and intolerance on which Ulster rests its opposition to Ireland's demand.

No doubt there are a large number of Protestants, both in Ulster and elsewhere, who feel with perfect sincerity that a Catholic parliament in Dublin would oppress them. It is not their sincerity, however, which is in question. What is in question is their unreasonableness. Were their apprehensions well founded, just and fair-minded people might be tempted to give heed to their cry. But the real facts of the case, and actual experiences in the past, point to the conclusion that their apprehensions are groundless.

The most remarkable feature in the Irish situation as regards Ulster is the frank refusal of Sir Edward Carson and his associates to discuss the question either in a reasonable temper, or upon an intelligible basis.

"Ulster," they say in short, "will not in any circumstances have home rule." The hypocritical plea that home rule ought not to be passed till another general election is held has, of course, no relevancy at all to the discussions, because Ulster's attitude is the claim of the extremists in Belfast and district to dictate to the electors of the United Kingdom how Ireland should be governed. This is not all. When it is pointed out that the present system which centres in Dublin Castle is not the last word in human wisdom, Ulster retorts, "Leave us alone—we will not have home rule." The psychology of this attitude of mind is worthy of the serious consideration of the democrat.

Whenever in the old days of Tory government the Irish nationalists justified the demand of home rule on the ground they were in a majority, Ulster retorted, "You form part of the United Kingdom, and there the majority of the electors are Unionists, and therefore you are not in a majority." Whenever the Irish members defied the Criminal Acts passed by Unionist governments, Ulster cried, "You are lawless and disloyal to the state." Now that the majority of the British people, as reflected by the home rule majority in the house of commons, are in favor of home rule, Ulster declares, "Majority or no majority, we will not have home rule." And when the government propose to set up an Irish

'Tis an Ill Wind That Blows Nobody Good

THIS is an old saying, and a true one. There are a whole lot of people in this city who have to dispose of their good automobiles. And the wind blows ill to them. They are willing to sell these machines at a fraction of their original cost. And the wind blows good to you. For it makes it possible for you to get an automobile, and get it for an amazingly low price. All you've got to do is to watch the Want Ads of this paper today and every day until you find the advertisement of the car you want. Then when you find this advertisement, answer it, and look over the car. Anyone thinking of buying an auto should look over these columns every day in order not to miss any of these wonderful opportunities. Most of these cars are in the best of condition. People don't sell their machines because the machines are no longer any good. There are a score of other reasons why a man is obliged to give up his automobile. Begin watching these Want Ads every day now. And begin answering them. You'll soon find the right car at the right price. And every time you answer an Ad, please mention this paper.
