A GIRL'S TERRIBLE RIDE.

Escaping From the Attack of a Fierce Stallion.

A' Braidentown, Fla., special to the Florida Times-Union of June 29th says: the outskirts of one of the big Miakka pastures, in which is a herd of horses over which a stallion known as Cash holds arbitrary power. Miss Nellie Murphy, the youngest daughter, is a fearless horse-woman, and frequently rides out alone and rounds up the cattle. A day or two ago Miss Nellie mounted her horse and rode out to drive some cattle home. The girl found the herd of horses and the cattle feeding together and, ignorant of the viciousness of the stallion, innocently rode up. The stallion instantly showed fight and charged like mad at the horse ridden by Miss Nellie. The girl realized her peril and then there began a ride for life. The little girl clung to her seat like a true horse-woman, and the two horses plunged along in their mad race of a mile through woods and meadows. The stallion bit at the girl and her horse alternately. Twice he fixed his teeth on the girl's shoulder, and frequently he bit viciously at her steed.

Mr. Murphy and family, viewing the race from the piazza, could only await the result with what terrible anxiety may be imagined. But Miss Nellie's horse played its part well, and dashed through the gate with its fair burden. Mr. Murphy had secured his rifle and fired at the stallion, then the horse turned around and galloped back to his herd. Miss Nellie fainted as she was lifted from the horse that had saved her by its speed. The girl was not much hurt, al-though somewhat torn by the teeth of the stallion.
